

TESTIMONIALS

IN FAVOUR OF THE

IMPERIAL DICTIONARY.

From the Rev. JAMES ROBERTSON, D.D., Professor of Divinity and Ecclesiastical History, Edinburgh College.

The comprehensive design of the work appears, from the specimen of it which I have had an opportunity of examining, to have been fully entered into by the Editor.

The outline given in the prospectus has been filled up by him with fidelity, perspicuity, and precision. His definitions, in particular, are clear, accurate, and concise; and where a word or term occurs, which is used in more than one signification, its different shades of meaning are distinguished and illustrated with much acuteness.

Having enjoyed for many years the friendship of the Editor, I am enabled to add that his integrity of character and indefatigable perseverance afford a most satisfactory guarantee that, if his health be continued, there will be no falling off in the portion of the work which, I understand, yet remains to be executed.

James Robertson

From JOHN CRUICKSHANK, LL.D., Professor of Mathematics, Marischal College, Aberdeen.

It appears to me fully to make good what is promised in the Prospectus, and to supply a want which has been long and greatly felt. From my knowledge of the talents, attainments, and industry of the Editor, I feel confident that there will be no falling off in the subsequent Numbers, but rather the reverse.

John Cruickshank, LL.D.

From PHILIP KELLAND, Esq., Professor of Mathematics, University of Edinburgh.

I have examined with some care the first three parts of your "Imperial Dictionary," and I have derived great pleasure and much instruction from the task.

To the Scientific Terms I have paid the most scrupulous attention, and I find them explained in terms sufficiently clear to be understood by all, at the same time that they are strictly accurate.

P. Kelland

From JAMES BOYD, LL.D., F.S.A. Scot., and Senior Master of the High School, Edinburgh.

After a careful examination of the first and second Parts, I feel warranted in affirming, that, so far as I am competent to judge, the plan of the work is excellent, and that it is wrought out with great ability. Indeed, until I learned the fact that the MS. had been submitted to the revision and correction of men eminent for their attainments in the several departments of human learning, I was at a loss to comprehend how one individual, even with the years of labour which I know your Editor has devoted to it, could so successfully have performed a task, which must, without such cooperation, have required for its accomplishment the energies of an Intellectual Hercules.

James Boyd

From W. M. GUNN, F.S.A. Scot., one of the Masters of the High School, Edinburgh.

I have much pleasure in stating, and I feel it to be a duty to do so, that I deem it a production of the greatest merit, and likely to supersede, for ordinary use, all existing works of a similar nature.

W. M. Gunn

From GEORGE MANSON, Head-Master of the General Assembly's Normal Institution, Edinburgh.

Should the successive Parts display the same amount of Editorial ability, and of interesting graphic illustration, as those already published, this work, when completed, will stand deservedly at the head of its class, and will fully justify the title which you have given it—"The Imperial Dictionary."

Geo Manson

From ROBERT HISLOP, Rector, Normal Seminary, connected with the Free Church, Glasgow.

It would assuredly be no easy matter to surpass the precision of the definitions, the accuracy of the descriptions, or the beauty and effectiveness of the wood-cuts; whilst, as an Etymological authority, it is sufficient to say, that it embodies all the excellencies of the great work of the American Lexicographer.

Robt Hislop

From Rev. ROBT. J. BROWN, D.D., Professor of Greek, Marischal College, Aberdeen.

It appears to me to be very well conceived, and ably executed.

R J Brown

From Rev. JOHN FLEMING, D.D., Professor of Natural Science, New College, Edinburgh.

GENTLEMEN,—So far as the three parts of your "Imperial Dictionary" enable me to form an opinion of the character of the publication in which you are engaged, I am satisfied that a great deal of industry and discrimination have been exercised in compiling it, and that the work will place within the reach of many, a great amount of valuable and useful information, at present accessible only to a few. With these convictions I earnestly wish you success in your important undertaking.

John Fleming

From Rev. ALEX. BLACK, D.D., Professor of Exegetical Theology, New College, Edinburgh.

A DICTIONARY was very much wanted, in which succinct and perspicuous explanations should be given of all the words that an English reader is likely to meet with in the most extensive perusal of the popular and scientific literature of the day; and the "Imperial Dictionary," published by Messrs. Blackie & Son, Glasgow, of which three parts have already appeared, gives promise of supplying that desideratum in the most admirable and satisfactory manner.

A peculiar feature of this Dictionary, which has hitherto been confined to encyclopedias and scientific works, consists of the frequent introduction of pictorial illustrations, which in the case of objects admitting of this species of explanation, present to the mind of the reader by the medium of the eye, a far more distinct representation of the reality than could be conveyed by a merely verbal description.

Alex. Black

From the Rev. JOHN BURNETT, LL.D., Vicar of Bradford.

I HAVE examined some numbers of the "Imperial Dictionary," and am highly pleased with the plan, and also with the execution of the Work. It combines in a small compass a Cyclopedia and a General Dictionary, and notices the very latest improvements and discoveries. It cannot fail to be very acceptable to a large class of students.

John Burnet LL.D.

From Rev. W. H. STOWELL, Professor of Theology, Rotherham College.

I have examined the earlier parts of the "Imperial Dictionary," now in the course of publication by Messrs. Blackie and Son, and can conscientiously recommend it as being, so far as I know, the most complete Dictionary of our language. The illustrative wood-cuts are very beautifully and carefully executed, and add much to the value of the work.

W. H. Stowell

From the Rev. THOS. S. CRISP, Baptist College, Bristol.

I HAVE examined several portions of the "Imperial Dictionary" with care, and as far as I can venture to pronounce on the character of such a Work, I readily bear my humble but decided testimony to its great merits.

The significations of the words are given fully, and with clearness and accuracy; while the reader is furnished with a large amount of scientific information, in an interesting form, and within a very moderate compass. The Engravings, which are necessarily minute, are executed with great spirit; and the explanations of terms of Art have evidently been prepared with much care by able literary writers.

The Editors have, I think, succeeded in rendering it, in no ordinary degree, a Work of valuable, as well as agreeable reading.

Thos. S. Crisp

From the Rev. HORATIO JAMES, Vicarage, Coln St. Aldwyns, Gloucestershire.

I HAVE no hesitation in stating from what I have already seen of the "Imperial Dictionary," that it promises to be a very useful and valuable publication. It embraces a very wide field of inquiry, and gives information in a concise and simple manner. It is exactly the book that has been long wanted by the general reader, giving the meaning of technical and scientific terms for which we should look in vain to any of the existing dictionaries.

Horatio James

From the Rev. WALTER SCOTT, President and Theological Tutor of Airedale College.

I HAVE examined the first division of "Blackie's Imperial Dictionary," and it appears to me to be decidedly the best Work of the kind in the English Language.

Walter Scott

From the Rev. H. GOUGH, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and Head Master of Carlisle Cathedral School.

IF the work be completed with the same comprehensive fulness and elaborate accuracy as the parts already published, it cannot fail to become the standard work of reference in the English language. H. GOUGH, M.A.

From the Rev. A. BATH POWER, M.A., Lower Close, Norwich.

I HAVE examined the three published parts of the "Imperial Dictionary," and have found this portion very copious and complete: much knowledge is displayed in many of the Etymologies, and great distinctness and accuracy in the many definitions which came under my notice. I looked carefully over a large number of the explanations of technical words, and found them correct and comprehensive; I observed very many which are not generally included in Scientific Dictionaries.

I consider Messrs. Blackie and Son's present undertaking an important addition to the Student's Library, and have no doubt of its being very useful in the pursuit of Science.

A. BATH POWER.

From JAMES THOMSON, LL.D., Professor of Mathematics, University of Glasgow.

I HAVE examined a considerable portion of Messrs. Blackie and Son's "Imperial Dictionary," and I regard it as a work of much value. It contains a large number of words not to be found in Johnson's, Walker's, or other standard and popular Dictionaries, and it is thus well fitted to the present state of the arts, and of human knowledge generally.

The explanations of the meanings of the various words and terms are given simply and clearly; and they cannot fail to be intelligible and satisfactory to all readers of ordinary intelligence.

James Thomson

From the Rev. E. COBHAM BREWER, CL., LL.D., Head Master of King's College School, Norwich.

GENTLEMEN,—Having been requested by one of your Agents to state my opinion respecting the "Imperial Dictionary," I have great pleasure in bearing testimony to the beauty of the type, the clearness of the Definitions, and to the great addition of words of recent introduction into our language. I have compared it with several cotemporary publications of a similar character, and hesitate not for one moment to say, it is decidedly the best of those which have come under my notice, although a large field is still left for future labour.

E Cobham Brewer Clk LLD

From Rev. JAMES ROBERTSON, M.A., Principal of Bishop's College, Bristol.

HAVING examined, as far as my leisure would permit, the three first divisions of your "Imperial Dictionary," I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to its great promise of usefulness. While to those readers who have not had the benefit of a classical education, and, therefore, are not acquainted with the origin of the many scientific and technical terms that occur so frequently in modern publications, it must prove of especial service, the scholar, too, will, I am sure, derive from its perusal great gratification and advantage, not only from the clear and satisfactory elucidation of the various acceptations of each word, but also from the really useful information that pervades the whole. In short, I cannot but look upon it as supplying a great desideratum at the present day, and if carried out in accordance with the parts already published, it will, in my opinion, be a valuable addition to our lexicographical works.

James Robertson Esq

From the Rev. JOHN MILNE, M.A., Principal of Huddersfield College.

AFTER the numerous attestations already given by competent judges to the merits of the "Imperial Dictionary," now in course of publication by Messrs. Blackie & Son, of Glasgow, it may appear superfluous or presumptuous to add the expression of my opinion, yet, as I have been requested to do so, I feel no hesitation in saying, from an inspection of the portions already published, and there can be no doubt, from the strongly attested character and ability of the Editor, that the entire Work will exhibit a uniformity of excellence, that the Dictionary will, when complete, form a most valuable addition to English Literature. The careful and well-considered Etymology,—the brevity, yet clearness and fulness of the Definitions,—the accurate discrimination of Idiom, together with the beauty of the Wood Cuts illustrative of the terms of science or of art, deserve the highest commendation,—while the explanation of Classical terms and allusions, so often to be met with in the works of our best writers, especially the poets, stamps upon it a peculiar value. As a book of reference, for all ordinary purposes, it appears to me to supersede the necessity of an Encyclopædia; and, apart from its value as a complete standard Dictionary of the English Language, it will form a repository of widely varied, yet highly useful and interesting information.

John Milne M.A.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DOUGLAS JERROLD'S WEEKLY NEWSPAPER.

"This is a monthly issue of great value. A Technological and Scientific Dictionary, from the great additions of such terms to our language in the last thirty years, has become a necessity, and the present seems admirably calculated to fulfil the want The just medium between a common dictionary and an encyclopedia seems to be properly adjusted. It is copiously illustrated with Wood Engravings, and the explanations are given with pith and point, erring, if anything, on the side of brevity, which indeed should not be considered an error, as such a book is made for rapid reference, and the long details too usually introduced perplex rather than enlighten the reader. The present work should be at the right hand of every man to solve a doubt at the instant. For students it will be invaluable."

CHESTER COURANT.

"We have no hesitation in recommending it to the favour of our readers, as a most useful, interesting, and able work of universal reference."

BRISTOL MERCURY.

"The work meets one of the wants of the times."

PLYMOUTH AND DEVONPORT JOURNAL.

"It is beyond comparison the best dictionary in our language." . . . "This excellent work has now reached the letter I, about the third of the alphabet, the last part of which is numbered 12; we do not think, therefore, that the 'Imperial Dictionary' can be well completed in the twenty-four promised parts. Far better would it be that twenty-four more parts were added, than that such a meritorious and useful work should be shorn of a single article of value. It has hitherto come on in a pre-eminent manner, and we trust that no attempt at brevity for the sake of bringing valuable matter in the short compass announced in the prospectus, will be attempted in a book of such sterling excellence. The 'Imperial Dictionary' will be the best publication of the kind, if continued throughout as it has been brought to the present time, and the exact number of parts can be of very little consequence to such persons as take in the work. Our earnest advice to the publishers, therefore, is to finish the Dictionary as it has been commenced, notwithstanding any error which may have been made in the estimated probable number of its parts."

SCOTTISH GUARDIAN.

"The 'Imperial Dictionary' may be read as well as consulted, as it contains a great variety and amount of useful information. The plan of the work is excellent, and we think it certain, that if it proceeds as it has commenced, the Publishers will find their enterprising exertions rewarded by an ample share of success."

NORTHERN WARDER.

"Beyond all its claims to be the most, we may say the only, complete English Dictionary, it has two features new in a work of this kind. It is a compact mass of pleasing and most interesting general information, apparent in every definition, and fully refutes the allegation that Dictionaries are only dry sort of reading. The other new feature is the illustrative cuts, which are numerous and finely executed, conveying at a glance by the eye, that which no words could by the ear, to the understanding. The idea of the illustrations is a happy one well applied."

GLASGOW COURIER.

"The matter and appearance of this superb book are both unexceptionable. When completed it will make a magnificent volume; and we trust that the encouragement given to it by the public will be such as to justify the expectations of its spirited proprietors."

INVERNESS COURIER.

"We have here a most valuable word-book, in itself a library of Dictionaries, and comprising a large amount of useful and interesting information connected with literature, art, and science."

GLASGOW CITIZEN.—SECOND NOTICE.

"We can safely pronounce this to be the most really useful, comprehensive, and entertaining book of information, in the form of a Dictionary, we have ever seen; and strongly do we recommend it as invaluable for the purposes of the family or general private library."

DUNDEE COURIER.

"We cannot too heartily recommend the 'Imperial Dictionary' to all who wish to know and understand the words and expressions now in daily use in our own language."

ABERDEEN JOURNAL.

"The 'Imperial Dictionary' is just what a Dictionary ought to be, and neither more nor less. It diverges not too much on the one hand to the nature of a minor Encyclopedia, nor on the other, does it sink down into the character of a mere word-book or vocabulary. It hits the felicitous medium; and, unlike most works of the kind, it is a perfectly readable book—in other words, one fitted for continuous reading; and we are confident we go not too far, when we characterize it as a work in which the idle may find amusement—the busy spend usefully a vacant hour—to which the learned may refer for more distinct information—and which the unlearned may consult with material advantage."

CALEDONIAN MERCURY.

"After a careful inspection of the work, so far as it has yet gone, we find its promises amply realised; the definitions are clear and concise, and the explanations and descriptions so full as to impart to it the combined character of an Encyclopedia and Dictionary; the names of things being always accompanied by accounts of the things themselves, drawn apparently from the latest and best sources of information, with the addition already alluded to, of a pictorial representation of the thing described."

FELIX FARLEY'S BRISTOL JOURNAL.

"A work on a scale so comprehensive as to embrace subjects hitherto confined to ponderous Cyclopædias, as well as the lexicography of our language. Such a work has long been wanted, and the specimen before us conveys an assurance that it is in able hands, and will, when complete, supply the best English Dictionary that has ever appeared since Tod's Johnson, with the advantage, too, of embracing many thousand words which have since then been adopted in our vocabulary."

AGRICULTURAL GAZETTE.

"We beg to call the attention of our readers to a publication of the greatest value to any of them who may be desirous of understanding their own language, more especially in its technical and relative uses and meanings. A dictionary has at length been published guiltless of the charge of being 'dry reading:' its pages are covered over with Nautical, Architectural, Zoological and Botanical illustrations, and filled with explanatory paragraphs, something more than mere definitions. . . . The arduous and tedious labours of an industrious Editor, assisted by colleagues in the various departments of those arts and sciences whose technology he has investigated, are now being developed in a work which will do honour to himself, credit to its publishers, and great good to its readers."

PERTHSHIRE CONSTITUTIONAL.

"The whole scope of this superb production is of a most comprehensive nature, and supplies a desideratum that no mere dictionary of terms on such a limited scale ever supplied before—partaking as it does of the nature of an Encyclopædia rather than the dry details of an ordinary explanatory lexicon—going much further than giving the mere conventional acceptation of words or their pronunciation. The reader has their etymological affinities presented to his attention, and may even glean and store his mind with no small degree of scientific and technological information, while he will find amusement as well as instruction in every page, although not consulting the work in the light of an authority for reference. The letterpress is beautiful too, and the typography altogether inviting to the eye."

FIFESHIRE JOURNAL—SECOND NOTICE.

"A work which ought, indeed, to be in every library, and to the pages of which there is no one who can fail to be obliged to have recourse at times, and to which recourse will always be had with advantage and profit. From the richness and fulness of its contents, 'The Imperial Dictionary' is calculated to supersede whole libraries of dictionaries, and the elegance of its form, typography, and illustrations, are additional recommendations of it to general use."

PREFACE.

For a number of years past a great revolution has manifestly been going on in the English language. Many words and terms formerly current have now passed into oblivion; many others have acquired new meanings, while the old ones have become obsolete, and in a greater variety of instances, new significations have been added, while the old ones are still retained; and thousands of words and terms have been introduced into our language which were altogether unknown in the time of Johnson, or even at a considerably later period. In ordinary literary and non-scientific works also, many words and terms are introduced which were formerly only to be met with in works of a strictly scientific character, and which have not hitherto found their way into any of our common English dictionaries. The reader must therefore remain in utter ignorance of the meaning of many of these terms, unless he be possessed of a library of dictionaries of the various departments of human knowledge, and even with that advantage, he will be often at fault, as many such terms have not yet been introduced into any dictionary whatever.

Various circumstances have contributed to bring about this result, but more especially the rapid progress which has in modern times been made in numerous departments of inquiry, the discoveries in science and the arts, the extensive applications of science to the various branches of industry, the popularization of knowledge, and its diffusion among the masses of the people.

From what has been stated above it appears obvious that an English dictionary of a comprehensive character—embracing all authorized English words both old and new, with their etymologies and various significations, and also the principal terms employed in the arts and sciences; and serving as a book of easy and ready reference to all classes of English readers, must prove of the highest utility, and must tend powerfully to facilitate the progress and diffusion of general knowledge. To supply this desideratum is the great object of the Imperial Dictionary.

The principal dictionaries of the English language in use at present, are Johnson's, first published in 1755; Richardson's, commenced in 1826; and that of Webster, of America, first published in this country in 1832.

Johnson's dictionary, although it must ever be regarded as a monument of the ability, labour, and research of its celebrated author, is nevertheless in some respects a very defective work. The etymological part is meagre and imperfect, being copied chiefly from Skinner and Junius; a great number of well authenticated English words are wanting, and although this defect has been in part supplied by Mason and Todd, the list is still imperfect even in common words, and still more defective from not including terms of science. Johnson's definitions are constructed often without sufficient consideration, and without any systematic plan; and he frequently errs in tracing the successive significations of a word. Many of Johnson's definitions, moreover, though they may have been accurate in his day, have now become erroneous or defective from the changes, already referred to, that have taken place in our language.

Richardson's dictionary, a work of undoubted merit, may be considered a critical rather than a practical dictionary, and one better adapted for the philological student than the general English reader. Instead of arranging the words in strict alphabetical order, and explaining each separately in its proper place as in common dictionaries, Richardson groups the derivatives under their primitives, and explains each group, or rather the primitive word in each group, by a short running commentary. Thus the verb to move, and eighteen derivatives, as movable, movement, motion, motive, &c., are classed and braced together, and an explanation given of the verb, while no notice is taken of the distinct meanings of the derivatives, with exception of the word motive. No one can consult Richardson's dictionary to any extent without perceiving the inconvenience of this arrangement. Indeed, for all general purposes it is to the ordinary reader little better than a sealed book. In the selection of words admitted as English, Richardson's dictionary is more limited than Johnson's as enlarged by Todd, and scientific and forensic terms are intentionally excluded. On the other hand, it contains a multitude of obsolete words and antiquated derivatives, many of which are of very questionable utility.

Webster's dictionary, which forms the basis of the present work, is acknowledged both in this country and in America to be not only superior to either of the two former, but to every other dictionary hitherto published. It is more copious in its vocabulary, more correct in its definitions, more comprehensive in its plan, and in the etymological department it stands unrivalled. The last edition of Todd's Johnson contains fifty-eight thousand words;—Webster increased the number to seventy thousand. For all practical purposes, the chief value of a dictionary consists in its definitions;—that is, in its giving a clear, accurate, and complete description of all the various shades of meaning which belong, by established usage, to the words of a language. In this department of lexicography Johnson achieved a great deal, and greatly lightened the labours of his successors; but still he left much to be accomplished. Webster has improved such of Johnson's definitions as were defective, corrected such as were erroneous, and added upwards of thirty thousand new definitions, which are distinguished by clearness, terseness, and completeness. In numerous instances also, he has pointed out the distinctions between words apparently synonymous, so that, to a great extent, his dictionary supplies the place of a book of synonymes. Webster spent thirty years of labour upon his dictionary; of these no fewer than ten were devoted to the etymological department alone, which for accuracy and completeness is unequalled. In tracing the origin of English words, he cites from more than twenty different languages which he studied attentively. Indeed, he is the only lexicographer who has adduced the Eastern as well as the European languages in the illustration of the English, and by this means he has thrown much light on the origin and primary signification of many words, and on the affinities between the English and many other languages.

Another important feature of Webster's dictionary is the introduction of the terms of science and art. In this respect it is distinguished from Todd's Johnson, in which thousands of such words are either not inserted, or are explained imperfectly.

Notwithstanding, however, the acknowledged superiority of Webster's dictionary over all others hitherto published, it does not come up to our idea of what a dictionary ought to be, in order fully to meet the wants of the present day. Webster has done much, but he has not done enough. He has omitted many English words and significations in frequent and well-authorized use; his list of scientific and technical terms is not sufficiently copious, and in defining or explaining those he has selected, he has not always consulted the best and most accurate authorities. Some of his definitions likewise have become inaccurate, owing to the progress and the improvements made in the arts and sciences since the time he wrote. There are some other faults of a minor description to be found in Webster, such as wrong accentuations, unwarranted alterations in the orthography of certain words, and instances of false orthoepy.

In adopting Webster's dictionary as the basis of the IMPERIAL DICTIONARY, the great object of the Editor in preparing the latter has been to correct what was wrong and to supply what was wanting in Webster, in order to adapt the new work to the present state of literature, science, and art. Accordingly, every page of Webster has been subjected to a careful examination, numerous alterations and emendations have been made, a vast number of articles have been rewritten, very many of Webster's explanations of important terms have been enlarged, and many new and more correct definitions of others given; new senses have been added to old words, where they were found wanting, and a multitude of new words and terms have been introduced, especially in the scientific and technological departments; so that to Webster's addition of 12,000 words to Todd's Johnson, a further addition has been made of at least 15,000 words and terms.

Generally speaking, the IMPERIAL DICTIONARY aims at containing all purely English words, and all words not English in ordinary use, together with the principal technical and scientific terms, and such as are to be met with in works not purely scientific. More particularly this Dictionary has for its object:—

1. To comprehend all the words contained in Johnson's dictionary, with the additions of Todd and Webster, and words selected from the other standard dictionaries and encyclopedias, together with many thousand words and terms in modern use, not included in any former English dictionary.

2. To exhibit the etymologies of English words, deduced from an examination and comparison of words of corresponding elements in the principal languages of Europe and Asia.

3. To render the pronunciation of words easy and obvious, by accentuation, by marking the sounds of the accented vowels when necessary, by writing the word a second time in different letters when the pronunciation is attended with any difficulty, or by general rules.

4. To give accurate and discriminating definitions of the words, illustrated by examples of their use, selected from the best authors, or by familiar phrases of undoubted authority.

5. To give explanations of Scripture terms and phrases, and when necessary, to cite passages from our common version, not only to illustrate the scriptural or theological sense, but even the ordinary significations of the words.

6. To give accurate definitions and explanations of technical and scientific terms, including those of recent origin, in

7. To distinguish words that are obsolete, obsolescent, unusual, partially authorized, colloquial, local, low, or vulgar; care being taken to retain those words which, though now obsolete, occur in our old English authors of celebrity.

8. To introduce such foreign words and terms as are frequently met with in English authors, together with some of the more expressive words of the Scottish language.

9. By the assistance of DIAGRAMS and ENGRAVINGS ON WOOD to furnish clearer ideas of various subjects and objects, and of the signification of various terms, than could be conveyed by mere verbal description. For this reason numerous terms in Architecture, Antiquities, Botany, Zoology, Heraldry, Mechanics, &c., frequently only to be understood by the aid of a figure, have been elucidated and rendered clear by engravings. Besides illustrations of terms, there have been introduced representations of the principal plants used in the arts, manufactures, and in medicine, of animals interesting from their habits or from their value to man, copies of many Mythological figures from celebrated sculptures and paintings, and a variety of other illustrations tending to please, while they also instruct.

Although the IMPERIAL DICTIONARY does not profess to contain all the terms of every art and science, yet it will be found to contain the principal and most important, and those which are most generally used, and certainly many more than the general and non-scientific reader is likely to meet with. Especial care has been taken to give explanations, as clear, accurate, and full as possible of terms connected with those sciences and branches of science which are most important in their practical applications; such as Natural Philosophy, Mechanics, Mathematics, Chemistry, and Mineralogy. Of such terms, the number admitted is very great, and also of those employed in Architecture, Engineering, Machinery, Manufactures, Commerce, Agriculture, Geology, Navigation, and Astronomy. In Botany, as it was found impossible to admit all the orders, genera, and species, only those have been selected which are most remarkable, or which are most important in an economical point of view. A similar plan has been adopted with regard to Zoological terms.

Neither labour nor expense has been spared in order to render this dictionary complete in all its departments, and worthy of public approbation. Upwards of ten years of unremitting toil and research have been spent by the Editor in preparing the work. The scientific terms have been revised by individuals of high standing in various departments of science and art, who, besides securing the accuracy of the definitions of the terms included by the Editor, have also supplied a variety of additional terms, many of them of recent origin. The other additional words and terms have been carefully selected and prepared by reference to the best and most authentic sources.

In selecting the illustrative figures, the greatest care has been taken to secure perfect accuracy; a work of no small difficulty, when the number and variety of sources consulted are taken into account, and when it is remembered that different authorities, especially writers on the natural sciences, often describe the same object under different names. There is no more fruitful source of error in popular works, or of perplexing difficulty to students, than this inconstancy of scientific nomenclature.

The IMPERIAL DICTIONARY will be found to contain, along with the etymologies and the definitions of words and terms, a large amount of useful and interesting information connected with literature, art, and science. A simple inspection of its pages will show, that, wherever it may be opened, it presents something to interest and instruct—some useful fact stated in concise terms—some important maxim or sentiment in religion, morality, law, or civil policy; so that the charge usually preferred against English dictionaries, namely, that they furnish but dry sort of reading, will not apply to this dictionary.

Notwithstanding the care that has been bestowed, the Editor is far from supposing that the present work is perfect, or even free from various errors and defects; but he indulges a hope that those of the IMPERIAL DICTIONARY will not be found more in number or greater in magnitude, than might reasonably be expected in an undertaking the execution of which is so difficult and laborious. The utmost efforts of the lexicographer, expended in exhibiting the whole circle of ideas embodied in the language of a highly civilized people, are only an approximation towards the great end in view. As the nearest approach yet made to this end, the Editor trusts this work will meet the wants of all those who consult a dictionary with no other view than hastily to remove the difficulty of the moment; that it will be found useful to the more advanced scholar; and that it will prove sufficient for the general purposes of all classes of English readers.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FRONTISPIECE.

THE picture from which our Frontispiece has been engraved, was painted by Raffaelle, when under thirty years of age, for Pope Julius II. about the year 1509. It is in fresco, and painted on the wall of one of a superb suite of apartments in the Vatican, called La camera della Segnatura. The size of the picture is 26 feet 6½ inches in length, by 15 feet 11 inches in height. Originally named "PHILOSOPHY," but now better known by the very inappropriate name, "THE SCHOOL OF ATHENS," this painting emblematizes the wisdom of the ancients in a representation of the learned men of ancient times. Raffaelle has here assembled in a large atrium, in the noble style of Bramante, many teachers of philosophy with their scholars, though living at different periods and in different countries; some are seen imparting instruction to an admiring audience, others demonstrating problems to surrounding pupils, some thoughtful, others communicative; each individual following the bent of his own genius.

Plato, and Aristotle his disciple, occupy the middle of the scene, and are holding a disputation. Plato, the representative of Speculative Philosophy, points upwards with uplifted arm; Aristotle stretches his outspread hand toward the earth, as the source of his Practical Philosophy. At each side, stretching deeper into the picture, a double row of attentive hearers is seen. Near this group, upon the left, Socrates, counting on his fingers, explains his principles and their conclusions to the young warrior Alcibiades, who is recognized by the beauty of his countenance and by his costume. On the opposite side, are placed several persons engaged in different ways, in conversation and study. In the foreground, on both sides, the sciences of Arithmetic and Geometry, with their subordinate studies, occupy separate groups. On the left, as the head of Arithmetic, we observe Pythagoras seated and writing on his knee; a young man holds up to him a tablet, on which are drawn the harmonic chords discovered by that philosopher, and around are his disciples Empedocles, Epicharmus, and Archytas. On the right, Archimedes, bending down, constructs a geometrical figure on a tablet lying on the ground. Several scholars watch his progress; the different degrees of their intelligence being most strikingly depicted. To Archimedes, Raffaelle has given the features of his patron and preceptor in architecture and geometry, Bramante, the celebrated architect. Next them are seen, as representing Astronomy and Geography, Zoroaster, the king of Bactria, his head adorned with a radial crown, and holding a celestial globe, and Ptolemy, the geographer, holding a terrestrial globe. Near to Zoroaster are two figures entering the hall, representing Raffaelle and Peruguino his master in painting. Alone, and seated on the steps, Diogenes, the chief of the cynic philosophers, in a state approaching to nudity, meditates on a tablet which he holds in his hand. A youth, directed by an old man, turns from him to the teachers of a higher philosophy.

"The general arrangement of this painting is most masterly. Plato and Aristotle, with the group of their scholars, are placed together in dignified regularity, without any appearance of stiffness or constraint; on each side and around them greater freedom prevails, with the utmost variety in the attitudes of the figures which compose the groups; while again the leading masses are still balanced most satisfactorily. The style is grand and free; a picturesque unity of effect seems to have been the artist's aim throughout, and this aim he has attained most perfectly. The taste of design, both in the nude and in drapery, is excellent, and is everywhere guided by the purest sentiment of beauty; the group of youths, in particular, collected round Archimedes, is among the most interesting and natural of Raffaelle's creations."—Kugler.

INTRODUCTION.

DEFINITION OF LANGUAGE.

LANGUAGE or Speech is the utterance of articulate sounds or voices, rendered significant by usage, for the expression and communication of thoughts.

According to this definition, language belongs exclusively to intellectual and intelligent beings, and, among terrestrial beings, to man only; for no animal on earth, except man, can pronounce words. The word language is sometimes used in a more comprehensive sense, and applied to the sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings or affections; as to the neighing of the horse, the lowing of the ox, the barking of the dog, and to the cackling and chirping of fowls; for the sounds uttered by these animals are perfectly understood by the respective species. So also language is figuratively applied to the signs by which deaf and dumb persons manifest their ideas, for these are instruments of communicating thoughts.

But language in its proper sense, as the medium of intercourse between men, or rational beings, endowed with the faculty of uttering articulate sounds, is the subject now to be considered.

Written language is the representation of significant sounds by letters, or characters, single or combined in words, arranged in due order, according to usage.

ORIGIN OF LANGUAGE.

We read in the Scriptures, that God, when he had created man, "Blessed them; and said to them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea," &c. God afterward planted a garden, and placed in it the man he had made, with a command to keep it, and to dress it; and he gave him a rule of moral conduct in permitting him to eat the fruit of every tree in the garden, except one, the eating of which was prohibited. We further read, that God brought to Adam the fowls and beasts he had made, and that Adam gave them names; and that when his female companion was made, he gave her a name. After the eating of the forbidden fruit, it is stated that God addressed Adam and Eve, reproving them for their disobedience, and pronouncing the penalties which they had incurred. In the account of these transactions, it is further related that Adam and Eve both replied to their Maker, and excused their disobedience.

If we admit what is the literal and obvious interpretation of this narrative, that vocal sounds or words were used in these communications between God and the progenitors of the human race, it results that Adam was not only endowed with intellect for understanding his Maker, or the signification of words, but was furnished both with the faculty of speech and with speech itself, or the knowledge and use of words as signs of ideas, and this before the formation of the woman. Hence, we may infer that language was bestowed on Adam, in the same manner as all his other faculties and knowledge, by supernatural power; or, in other words, was of divine origin: for supposing Adam to have had all the intellectual powers of any adult individual of the species who has since lived, we cannot admit as probable, or even possible, that he should have invented and constructed even a barren language, as soon as he was created, without supernatural aid. It may, indeed, be doubted, whether, without such aid, men would ever have learned the use of the organs of speech, so far as to form a language. At any rate, the invention of words and the construction of a language must have been by a slow process, and must have required a much longer time than that which passed between the creation of Adam and of Eve. It is therefore probable that language, as well as the faculty of speech, was the immediate gift of God. We are not, however, to suppose the language of our first parents in paradise to have been copious, like most modern languages; or the identical language they used, to be now in existence. Many of the primitive radical words may and probably do exist in various languages: but observation teaches that languages must improve and undergo great changes as knowledge increases, and be subject to continual alterations, from other causes incident to men in society.

A BRIEF ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN AND PROGRESS OF THE PRINCIPAL LANGUAGES, ANCIENT AND MODERN, THAT HAVE BEEN SPOKEN BY NATIONS BETWEEN THE GANGES AND THE ATLANTIC OCEAN.

We learn from the Scriptures that Noah, who, with his family, was preserved from destruction by the Deluge, for the purpose of re-peopling the earth, had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth. This fact, a little obscured by tradition, was retained by our rude German ancestors, to the age of Tacitus.*

Japheth was the eldest son; but Shem, the ancestor of the Israelites and of the writers of the Scriptures, is named first in order.

The descendants of Shem and Ham peopled all the great plain situated north and west of the Persian Gulf, between that Gulf and the Indian Ocean on the east, and the Arabic Gulf and the Mediterranean Sea on the west, with the northern coast of Africa, comprehending Assyria, Babylonia or Chaldea, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and Libya. The principal languages or dialects used by these descendants, are known to us under the names of Chaldee, or Chaldaic, which is called also Aramean, Syriac, Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan, and Coptic. Of these, the Chaldee and Hebrew are no longer living languages, but they have come down to us in books: the Samaritan is probably extinct or lost in the modern languages of the country, but the language survives in a copy of the Pentateuch; the Coptic is nearly or quite extinct, and little of it remains; the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic are yet living languages, but they have suffered and are continually suffering alterations, from which no living language is exempt.

These languages, except the Coptic, being used by the descendants of Shem, we call Shemitic, or Assyrian, in distinction from the Japhetic. As the descendants of Japheth peopled Asia Minor, the northern parts of Asia, about the Euxine and Caspian, and all Europe, their languages have, in the long period that has elapsed since their dispersion, become very numerous.

All languages having sprung from one source, the original words from which they have been formed must have been of equal antiquity. That the Celtic and Teutonic languages in Europe are, in this sense, as old as the Chaldee and Hebrew, is a fact not only warranted by history and the common origin of Japheth and Shem, but susceptible of proof from the identity of many words yet existing in both stocks. But there is a marked difference between the Shemitic and Japhetic languages; for even when the radical words are unquestionably the same, the modifications, or inflections and combinations which form the compounds, are, for the most part, different.

As it has been made a question which of the Shemitic languages is the most ancient, and much has been written to prove it to be the Hebrew, we will state briefly our opinion on what appears to us to be one of the plainest questions in the history of nations. We have for our certain guides, in determining this question—1st, The historical narrative of facts in the Book of Genesis; and 2d, The known and uniform progress of languages, within the period of authentic profane history.

1. The Scripture informs us that before the dispersion, the whole earth was of one language and of one or the same speech; and that the descendants of Noah journeyed from the east, and settled on the plain of Shinar, or in Chaldea. The language used at that time, by the inhabitants of that plain, must then have been the oldest or the primitive language of man. This must have been the original Chaldee.

2. The Scripture informs us, that in consequence of the impious attempts of the people to build a city, and a tower whose top might reach to heaven, with a view to make themselves a name and prevent their dispersion, God interposed and confounded their language, so that they could not understand each other; in consequence of which they were dispersed "from thence over the face of all the earth."

3. If the confusion of languages at Babel originated the differences which gave rise to the various languages of the families which separated at the dispersion, then those several languages are all of equal antiquity. Of these the Hebrew, as a distinct language, was not one; for the Hebrew nation was of posterior origin.

4. All the words of the several great races of men, both in Asia and Europe, which are vernacular in their several languages, and unequivocally the same, are of equal antiquity, as they must have been derived from the common Chaldee stock which existed before the dispersion. The words common to the Syrians and Hebrews could not have been borrowed from the Hebrew; for the Hebrews originated from Heber and Abram, several centuries after Syria and Egypt were populous countries. This fact is attested by the Scripture history, which declares that when Abram migrated from Chaldea, and came into Canaan or Palestine, "the Canaanite was then in the land;" and when he returned from Egypt, ' the Perizzite dwelt in the land." These declarations, and the history of Abimelech, and of the war of four kings or chieftains with five; as also of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, prove Syria to have been at that time well peopled. The language of the inhabitants, then, must have been coeval with the nation, and long anterior to the Hebrew as a distinct dialect. It may be added, that in the early periods of the world, when no books existed, nations, living remote or distinct, never borrowed words from each other. One nation living in the midst of another, as the Hebrews did among the Egyptians, may adopt a single word, or a few words; but a family of words thus adopted, is an occurrence rarely or never known. The borrowing of words, in modern times, is almost wholly from the use of books.

5. It is probable that some differences of language were produced by the confusion; but neither that event nor any supernatural event is necessary to account for the differences of dialect or of languages now existing. The different modern languages of the Gothic or Teutonic stock, all originated in the natural course of events: and the differences are as great between them as they are between the languages of the Shemitic stock.

6. Soon after two races of men of a common stock have separated and placed themselves in distant countries, the language of each begins to diverge from that of the other, by various means.—1. One tribe or nation will suffer one word to become obsolete and be forgotten; another, will suffer the loss of another; sometimes a whole family of words will be lost; at other times, a part only; at other times, a single word only of a numerous family will be retained by one nation, while another nation will retain the whole. 2. The same word will be differently applied by two distant races of men, and the difference will be so great as to obscure the original affinity. 3. Words will be compounded by two nations in a different manner, the same radical words taking a different prefix or suffix, in different languages. Thus wisdom in English is in German weisheit, [wise-head, wisehood,] from wise, weis. The English mislead is in Danish forleder, from lead, leder. 4. The pronunciation and orthography of words will often be so much changed, that the same word in two languages cannot, without difficulty, be recognized as identical. No person, without a considerable attention to the changes which letters have suffered, would at once suspect or believe the English let and the French laisser to be the same word.

7. As Abram migrated from Chaldea, he must have spoken the Chaldee language; and probably, at that time, the Syriac, Arabic, and Egyptian, had not become so different, as to render it impracticable for him to converse with the inhabitants of Palestine and Egypt. But the language of Abram's descendants, and that of the land of Shinar or the Chaldee, must, in the natural course of things, have begun to diverge soon after the separation; and the changes in each language being different, would, in the course of a few centuries, form somewhat different languages. So in the days of Hezekiah, the Syriac and Hebrew had become, in a degree, distinct languages; 2 Kings xviii. In which of these languages the greatest number of alterations were produced, we do not know; but it would appear that the Chaldee dialect, in the use of dental letters instead of sibilants, is much the most general in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of Europe. Thus the German only has a sibilant in wasser, when the other Teutonic languages have a dental, water. We think also that there are far more words in the European languages which accord with the Chaldee or Arabic, than there are words which accord with the Hebrew. If this observation is well founded, the Hebrew must have suffered the loss of more primitive words than the other languages of the Shemitic family. This, however, is true, that all of them have lost some words, and in some cases the Hebrew retains what the others have lost.

8. The Hebrew Scriptures are, by many centuries, the most ancient writings extant. Hence probably the strange inference, that the Hebrew is the oldest language; as if the inhabitants of Chaldea and Syria had had no language for ages before the progenitor of the Hebrews was born.

9. The vernacular words in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of modern Europe, which are evidently the same words as still exist in the Shemitic languages, are of the same antiquity; being a part of the common language which was used on the plain of Shinar, before the dispersion.

The descendants of Japheth peopled the northern part of Asia, and all Europe; or if some colonies from Egypt planted themselves in Greece at an early period, they or their descendants must have been merged in the mass of Japhetic population. Certain it is that the Greek language is chiefly formed on the same radical words as the Celtic and Teutonic languages.

The Japhetic tribes of men, whose descendants peopled the south and west of Europe, were first established in the country now called Persia, or, by the natives themselves, Iran. Of this fact, the evidence now existing is decisive. The numerous words found in the Greek, Latin, Gaelic, English, and the kindred tongues, which are still used in Persia, prove, beyond all question, that Persia must have been the residence of the people whose descendants introduced into Europe the languages from which the modern languages are derived. The fact proves further, that a great body of the original Persians remained in their own country, and their descendants constitute the mass of the population at this day.

In the early stages of society, men dwelt or migrated in families, tribes, or clans. The family of Abraham and Jacob in Asia, and the clans of the Gaels in Scotland, exhibit to us the manner in which societies and nations were originally formed. The descendants of a man settled around him, and formed a clan, or tribe, of which the government was patriarchal. Such families often migrated in a body, and often the personal characteristics of the progenitor might be distinctly traced in his descendants for many generations. In process of time, some of these families became nations; more generally, by means of wars and migrations, different tribes became blended, and the distinction of families was lost.

In rude ages, the families or tribes of men are named from some characteristic of the people; or, more generally, from the place of their residence. The Greeks gave the name of Scythia to the north of Europe and Asia, but the primitive inhabitants of the west of Europe they called Κελτοι, Kelts, Celts, a word signifying woods men.* These were descendants from the same ancestors as the Greeks and Romans themselves, but they had pushed their migrations into Gaul, Spain and Britain. The first settlers or occupiers of these countries were driven forward by successive hordes, until they were checked by the ocean; there they made their stand, and there we find their descendants at this day. These may be considered as the descendants of the earliest settlers or first inhabitants of the countries where they are found. Among these are the inhabitants of France, south of the Garonne, and those of the north of Spain, called by the Romans Aquitani and Cantabri, in more modern times Gascoigns, Basques, and Cantabrians, who still retain their native language; and in Great Britain, the Gaels in Scotland, and the natives of the north and west of Ireland, who also retain their primitive language.†

The first inhabitants of the north and west of Europe, known to the Greeks and Romans, to whom we are indebted for our earliest accounts of that region, were the Cimbri, who inhabited the peninsula of Denmark, now called Jutland, and the tribes which belonged to the Teutonic and Gothic races which were established in Germany and on both sides of the Baltic. Whether tribes of Celtic origin had overspread the latter countries before the arrival of the Gothic and Teutonic races, and all Europe had been inhabited by the Celts even to the borders of Sarmatia, has been a question much disputed by historians and antiquaries. The German and French writers generally contend that the Celts inhabited all the north of Europe, as far at least as Sarmatia; but some respectable English writers are of a different opinion. Now it is agreed that the Welsh are descendants of the Cimbri, inhabitants of Jutland; and their language bears a strong affinity to the Celtic languages which still exist; a fact that countenances the opinion of the German and French writers. But the dispute is of little moment: the Celtic, Teutonic and Gothic races being all of the Japhetic stock, migrating from Asia through Asia Minor at different times, and pursuing different courses westward. The first tribes probably sought the warm climates along the north coast of the Mediterranean, and established themselves in Greece and Italy. Others followed the course of the Danube and its subsidiary streams, till they fell upon the rivers that conducted them to the Baltic. The first inhabitants of Greece and Italy were probably of the Celtic race; but if they were, it is very evident that tribes of the Teutonic or Gothic races invaded those countries before they were civilized, and intermingled with the original inhabitants. The Pelasgi may have been among the number. This is an inference which we draw from the affinities of the Greek and Latin languages with those of Teutonic origin. The Teutonic and Gothic races impressed their language upon all the continent of Europe west of the Vistula, and from that river to the Rhine, or rather to the Seine, anterior to the conquest of Gaul by Julius Cesar. The same races invading and conquering the south of Europe, in the fourth and fifth centuries, on the downfall of the Roman empire, infused a portion of their language into the Italian and Spanish, which is still distinguishable.

The ancient Sarmatia, including Poland and Russia, was probably peopled originally by races of men who passed into Europe by the country north of the Euxine. Their original residence was along the rivers Kur and Araxes, or on the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian. The name of the Russ or Russians is clearly recognized in the Roxolani of Pliny and Ptolemy, and possibly the ancestors of this race may have entered Europe by Asia Minor. That the Teutonic races, originally from Persia, inhabited Asia Minor, and migrated westward by that course, is evident from the names which they impressed on mountains, rivers and places. Such are the Cragus of Pliny, the Welsh and English crag;‡ Perga in Pamphylia, now burg or bergen; Thymbreck, the name of a small stream, near the site of Troy; a word in which we recognize the English brook; it was contracted by the Greeks into Thymbrius.§

It is admitted by all gentlemen acquainted with oriental literature, that the Sanscrit, or ancient language of India, the parent of all the dialects of that great peninsula, is radically the same language or from the same stock as the Greek and Latin; the affinities between them being remarkably clear and decisive. If so, the inhabitants of India and the descendants of the Celtic and Teutonic nations are all of one family, and must have all migrated from one country after the separation of the nations of the Shemitic stock from those of the Japhetic race.‖

Whether that country was Persia, or Cashmir, or a country further east, is a point not easily determined. One important inference results from this fact, that the white men of Europe and the black or tawny men of India, are direct descendants from a common ancestor.

Of the languages of Europe, the Greek was first improved and refined, and next to that the Latin. The affinity between these languages and those of the west and north of Europe is very striking, and demonstrates their common origin. It is probable, however, that there are some words in the Greek derived from Africa, if Egyptian colonies were established in Greece, as historians inform us.

The modern Italian, Spanish, French and Portuguese, are composed chiefly of Latin words, much altered, however, both in orthography and inflections. Perhaps nine tenths of all the words now found in those languages are of Latin origin; being introduced by the Romans, who held Gaul in subjection five or six centuries, and Spain much longer; or being borrowed from Latin authors, since the revival of letters. All these languages, however, retain many words of Celtic origin; the primitive language not having been entirely extirpated. In some instances, the same word has been transmitted through both channels, the Celtic and the Latin, and is yet retained. Thus in French céder, and in Italian cedere, is directly from the Latin cedo; while the French congedier, and Italian congedare, are composed of the same word, with a prefix, derived from the Celtic, and retained in the Welsh gadaw, to quit, to leave, [L. concedo.] And this same verb probably appears also in quit, a word common to the Teutonic and to the Celtic languages. See Conge in the Dictionary.

It must be observed further, that the Spanish language contains some words of African origin, introduced by the Carthaginians before the Roman conquest of Spain, or afterward by the Moors, who for several centuries were masters of that country. It contains also some words of Gothic origin, intro-

* Welsh celt, a cover or shelter, a Celt; celtiad, an inhabitant of the covert or wood; celu, to conceal, Lat. celo. In Gaelic the word is coill or ceill. The Celts were originally a tribe or nation inhabiting the north of Italy, or the still more northern territory.

† We purposely omit all consideration of the different families, tribes or nations which first peopled Greece and Italy. In Greece, we read of the Γραιοι or Γραικοι, the Hellenes, the Achæans, the Dorians, the Æolians, the Ionians, the Pelasgi, &c. In Italy, of the Illyrians, the Liburni, the Siculi, the Veneti or Heneti, the Iberi, Ligures, Sicani, Etrusci, Insubres, Sabini, Latini, Samnites, and many others. But as these nations or their descendants gave the name of CELTS to the Umbri, or nations that dwelt in the north, in the less cultivated parts of Europe, and to the inhabitants of Gaul; and as all the tribes, under whatever denomination they were known, were branches of the great Japhetic stock, we shall call them by that general name, CELTS; and under the general name of Goths or Teutons, shall comprehend the various tribes that inhabited the north of Germany, and the country north of the Baltic or Scandinavia.

A late writer seems to consider the Teutonic races as the only ancestors of the Greeks and Romans But from Celtic words still found in the Greek and Latin words not belonging to any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages, it is demonstrably certain that the primitive settlers in Greece and Italy belonged to the Celtic races. Thus the Greek βραχιων, Lat. brachium, the arm, is formed on the Gaelic braigh, raigh, W. braç, a word not found among the Teutonic nations. So the Welsh mociaw, to mock, is found in the Greek μωκαω, and French moquer, to mock, and Ir. mogadh, a mocking; but not in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. Many similar facts prove that the Celtic races were among the earliest inhabitants of Greece.

‡ Plin. H. N. lib. 5. cap. 27. Strabo, lib. 7. 6, informs us that the Dalmatians had the singular practice of making a division of their fields every eighth year. Hence perhaps the name, from deal, and math or madh, country.

§ Clarke's Travels.

duced by the Goths who conquered that country, at the downfall of the Roman Empire. The French also contains some words of Teutonic origin, either from the Belgic tribes who occupied the country to the Seine at the time of Cesar's invasion, or from the Franks who established the dynasty of the Merovingian kings in the fifth century, or from the Normans who obtained possession of the northern part of that kingdom in the tenth century, or from all these sources.

The German, Dutch or Belgic, Anglo-Saxon, Danish and Swedish languages, are of Teutonic or Gothic origin.* They are all closely allied; a great part of the words in them all being the same or from the same roots, with different prefixes or affixes. There is, however, a greater difference between the Danish and Swedish, which are of the Gothic stock, and the German and Dutch, which are of Teutonic origin, than between two languages of the same stock, as between the Danish and Swedish. The Norwegian, Icelandic, and some of the languages or dialects of Switzerland, belong to the same stock.

The basque or Cantabrian in Spain; the Gaelic in the north of Scotland, and the Hiberno-Celtic or native language of Ireland, are the purest remains of the ancient Celtic. From a comparison of a vocabulary of the Gaelic and Hiberno-Celtic, we find little or no difference between them; and from a long and attentive examination of this language, and of the languages of Teutonic origin, we find less difference between them than most authors have supposed to exist.

The Armoric or language of Brittany in the northwest angle of France, and the Cornish, in the southwest of England, are also of Celtic origin. The Cornish is now extinct; but the Armoric is a living language.

The English, as now spoken, is a language composed of words from several others. The basis of the language is Anglo-Saxon, or, as we shall, for the sake of brevity, call it, Saxon, by which it is closely allied to the languages of Teutonic and Gothic origin on the continent. But it retains a great number of words from the ancient languages of Britain, the Belgic or Loegrian, and the Cymraeg or Welsh, particularly from the latter, and some from the Cornish. Cesar informs us, that before he invaded Britain, Belgic colonies had occupied the southern coast of England; and the inhabitants of the interior, northern and western parts, were the ancestors of the present Welsh, who call themselves Cymry, and their country Cymru, a name which indicates their origin from the Cimbri, inhabitants of the modern Denmark, or Cimbric Chersonese, now Jutland.

The modern Welsh contains many Latin words introduced by the Romans, who had possession of Britain for five hundred years. But the body of the language is probably their vernacular tongue. It is more nearly allied to the languages of Celtic origin, than to those of the Teutonic and Gothic stock; and of this British language, the Cornish and Armoric are dialects.

It has been commonly supposed that the Britons were nearly exterminated by the Saxons, and that the few that survived, escaped into the west of England, now Wales. It is true that many took refuge in Wales, which their descendants still retain; but it cannot be true that the other parts of England were entirely depopulated. On the other hand, great numbers must have escaped slaughter, and been intermixed with their Saxon conquerors. The Welsh words, which now form no unimportant part of the English language, afford decisive evidence of this fact. It is probable, however, that these words were for a long time used only by the common people, for few of them appear in the early Saxon writers.

The English contains also many words introduced by the Danes, who were for some time masters of England; which words are not found in the Saxon. These words prevail most in the northern counties of England; but many of them are incorporated into the body of the language.

After the Conquest, the Norman kings endeavoured to extirpate the English language, and substitute the Norman. For this purpose, it was ordained that all law proceedings and records should be in the Norman language; and hence the early records and reports of law cases came to be written in Norman. But neither royal authority, nor the influence of courts, could change the vernacular language. After an experiment of three hundred years, the law was repealed; and since that period, the English has been, for the most part, the official, as well as the common language of the nation. A few Norman words, however, remain in the English; most of them in law language.

Since the Conquest, the English has not suffered any shock from the intermixture of conquerors with the natives of England; but the language has undergone great alterations, by the disuse of a large portion of Saxon words, and the introduction of words from the Latin and Greek languages, with some French, Italian, and Spanish words. These words have, in some instances, been borrowed by authors directly from the Latin and Greek; but most of the Latin words have been received through the medium of the French and Italian. For terms in the sciences, authors have generally resorted to the Greek; and from this source, as discoveries in science demand new terms, the vocabulary of the English language is receiving continual augmentation. We have also a few words from the German and Swedish, mostly terms in mineralogy; and commerce has introduced new commodities of foreign growth or manufacture, with their foreign names, which now make a part of our language.—Such are camphor, amber, arsenic, and many others.

The English then is composed of,

1st, Saxon and Danish words of Teutonic and Gothic origin.

2nd, British or Welsh, Cornish and Armoric, which may be considered as of Celtic origin.

3rd, Norman, a mixture of French and Gothic.

4th, Latin, a language formed on the Celtic and Teutonic.

5th, French, chiefly Latin corrupted, but with a mixture of Celtic.

6th, Greek, formed on the Celtic and Teutonic, with some Coptic.

7th, A few words directly from the Italian, Spanish, German, and other languages of the continent.

8th, A few foreign words, introduced by commerce, or by political and literary intercourse.

Of these, the Saxon words constitute our mother tongue; being words which our ancestors brought with them from Asia. The Danish and Welsh also are primitive words, and may be considered as a part of our vernacular language. They are of equal antiquity with the Chaldee and Syriac.

AFFINITY OF LANGUAGES.

On comparing the structure of the different languages of the Shemitic and Japhetic stocks, we cannot but be struck with the fact, that although a great number of words consisting of the same or of cognate letters, and conveying the same ideas, are found in them all; yet in the inflections, and in the manner of forming compounds and derivatives, there are remarkable differences between the two great families. In the modifications of the verb, for expressing person, time, and mode or mood, very little resemblance is observable between them. If we could prove that the personal terminations of the verb, in the Japhetic languages, were originally pronouns, expressive of the persons, we should prove an affinity between the words of the two races in a most important particular. Some attempts of this kind have been made, but not with very satisfactory results.†

In the formation of nouns, we recognize a resemblance between the English termination th, in birth, truth, drouth, [Saxon drugothe,] warmth, &c., and the Shemitic terminations ית and ות; and the old plural termination en, retained in oxen, and the Welsh plural ending ion, coincide nearly with the Arabic termination of the dual number ان an, and the regular masculine plural termination ون on, as well as with the Chaldee, Hebrew, and Syriac ין in. And it is justly remarked by Mitford, that in the variety of plural terminations of nouns, there is a striking resemblance between the Arabic and the Welsh. There is one instance, in the modern languages of Teutonic origin, in which we find the Arabic nunnation:—this is the German and Dutch binnen, the Saxon binnan or binnon, signifying within, Hebrew and Chaldee בין, Ar. بين bin, without the mark of nunnation when it signifies within; but when it signifies separation, space, interval, the original sense, it is written بين, and pronounced, with the nunnation, like the Teutonic word binnon.

* In strictness, the Swedish and Danish are of Gothic origin, and the German and Saxon, of Teutonic origin.

† According to Dr. Edwards, there is a remarkable resemblance between the Shemitic languages and the Muhhekaneew, or Mohegan, one of the native languages of New England, in the use of the pronouns as prefixes and affixes to verbs.—Observations, &c. p. 13.

One mode of forming nouns from verbs in the Shemitic languages is by prefixing m. We know of no instance of this manner of formation in the Japhetic languages, except in some names which are of oriental origin. Mars is said to be from αρης, but if so, the word was undoubtedly formed in the East. So we find Morpheus, the god of sleep, to be probably formed with the prefix m, from the Ethiopic አዐረፈ aorf, to rest, to fall asleep; whence we infer that Morpheus is sleep deified.*

But as many words in all the languages of Europe and Asia are formed with prepositions, perhaps it may be found on examination, that some of these prefixes may be common to the families of both stocks, the Japhetic and the Shemitic. We find in German gemüth, in Dutch gemoed, from muth, moed, mind, mood. We find mad in Saxon is gemaad; polish, the Latin polio, is in Welsh caboli; mail in Italian is both maglia and camaglia; belief in Saxon is geleaf, and in German glaube. We find that in the Shemitic languages מלא signifies to fill or be full, and we find in the Arabic كمل kamala, has the same signification. In Syriac, ܓܠ gal, signifies to remove; and ܩܓܠ kagal, signifies to wander in mind, to be delirious. In Chaldee and Syriac, דמר is to wonder, precisely the Latin demiror, which is a compound of de and miror.

We find also that nations differ in the orthography of some initial sounds, where the words are the same. Thus the Spanish has llamar, llorar, for the Latin clamo, ploro; and the Welsh has llawr, for the English floor, llabi, a tall, lank person, coinciding with flabby, llac for slack, and the like.

As the prepositions and prefixes, in all languages, constitute an important class of words, being used in composition to vary the sense of other parts of speech, to an almost unlimited extent, it may be useful to give them a particular consideration.

The simple prepositions are, for the most part, verbs or participles, or derived from them; when verbs, they are the radical or primary word, sometimes varied in orthography by the addition or alteration of a single vowel, or perhaps, in some cases, by the loss of the initial consonant, or aspirate. Such are the Greek παρα, περι, κατα; the Latin con and per; the English for, which retain their original consonants. The following, of, by, in, on, un; the Latin ab, ad, pro, præ, re; the Greek απο, επι, προ, may have lost the initial or final consonants; of for hof; in for hin; ab for hab; pro for prod. In some words this loss can only be conjectured; in others, it is known or obvious. Thus the English by and be was originally big, as it is in the Saxon, and the Latin re is written also red, evidently a derivative of an Arabic verb still existing; the Latin sub and super are formed probably from the Greek ὑπο, ὑπερ, by the change of an aspirate into s, or the Greek words have lost that letter. The English but in the phrase "They are all here but one," is a participle; the Saxon butan, or buton; Dutch buiten, from buiten, to rove. Among is the Saxon gemang the verb, or the participle of gemengan, to mingle.

In general, the primary sense of the preposition is moving, or moved. Thus to in English, and ad in Latin, primarily denote advancing toward a place or object; as in the sentence, "We are going to town." From, of, Lat. ab, Gr. απο, denote motion from a place or object. The French près, is from the Italian presso, and this is the Latin participle pressus, pressed; hence it denotes near, close.

In some instances prepositions are compounds, as the English before; that is, be or by fore, by the front; and the Fr. auprès, at or near.

Prepositions, from their frequent use and from the ease with which their primary signification is modified to express differences of position, motion, or relation, as occasions demand, have, in many instances, a great variety of applications; not, indeed, as many as lexicographers sometimes assign to them, but several different, and sometimes opposite significations; as, for examples, the English for, with; the Latin con, and the Greek παρα. For, which is from the root of the Saxon faran, Gr. πορευομαι, to pass, denotes toward, as in the phrase, "A ship bound for Jamaica;" or it denotes in favour of, as "This measure is for the public benefit;" or "The present is for a friend." But it denotes also opposition or negation, as in forbear, forgive, forbid.

With is a verb, but has rather the sense of a participle. It is found in the Gothic with a prefix, ga-withan, to join or unite. Its primary sense then is joined, close; hence, in company; as in the sentences—"Go with him," "Come with me." It has the sense also of from, against, contrariety, opposition, as in withdraw, withstand, without. In Saxon it had also the sense of toward, as "with eorthan," toward the earth; also of for, denoting substitution or equivalent in exchange, as "sylan with dæges weorce," to give for a day's work; also of opposite, over against, as "with tha sæ," opposite the sea.

Con in Latin generally signifies with, toward, or to, denoting closeness or union, approach, joint operation and the like, as in concurro, conjungo, congredior; but it has also the sense of against or opposition, as in contendo.

The Greek παρα is doubtless from the root of the English fare, Saxon faran, to go, to pass. It signifies from, that is, departure—also at, to, Lat. ad; near, with, beyond, and against.

To understand the cause of the different and apparently contrary significations, we are to attend to the primary sense. The effect of passing to a place is nearness, at, presso, près, and this may be expressed by the participle, or, in a contracted form, by the verb. The act of passing or moving toward a place, readily gives the sense of such prepositions as to, and the Latin ad, and this advance may be in favour or for the benefit of a person or thing, the primary sense of which may perhaps be best expressed by toward; "A present or a measure is toward him." But when the advance of one thing toward another is in enmity or opposition, we express the sense by against, and this sense is especially expressed when the motion or approach is in front of a person, or intended to meet or counteract another motion. Hence the same word is often used to express both senses; the context determining which signification is intended. Thus for in English, in the sentence, "He that is not for us is against us," denotes in favour of. But in the phrase, "for all that," it denotes opposition. "It rains, but for all that, we will take a ride," that is, in opposition to that, or notwithstanding the rain, we will ride.

The Greek παρα, among other senses, signifies beyond, that is, past, and over, Hebrew עבר.

The prepositions which are used as distinct words, are called separable prepositions, or more generally prepositions:—those which are used only in composition are called inseparable prepositions. For the sake of brevity, we give to all words or single letters, prefixed to other words in composition, the general name of prefixes.

One of the best modes of ascertaining the true sense of a preposition, is, to examine its various uses in composition, and discover what effect it has in modifying the signification of the word to which it is prefixed.

Prepositions, used in compounds, often suffer the loss or change of a letter, for the sake of euphony, or the ease of pronunciation. Thus ad in Latin becomes f in affero; con becomes col in colligo; the Greek παρα loses a letter in παρειμι, as does αντι in many words.

The following sketch of the principal prepositions and prefixes in several languages of Europe, will exhibit some of the affinities of these languages, and, in a degree, illustrate the uses of this class of words.

* Ludolf, Col. 446, 447.

SAXON AND GOTHIC.

And, Saxon and Gothic, signifies against, opposite. This is the Greek αντι, and Latin ante, not borrowed from the Greek or Latin, but a native word. Examples, andstandan, to stand against, to resist; andswarian, answarian, to answer; that is, to speak again, against, or in return.

Amb, emb, ymb, usually emb, Saxon, signifying about, around; coinciding with the Latin amb, and Greek αμφι. Example, emb-faran, to go around, to walk about; embutan, about; emb, about; and butan, without. See But. Ambeht, embeht, ymbeht, office, duty; whence we have ambassador. This in Gothic is andbahtei; and a bailiff, minister, or servant, is andbahts. The Germans have the word contracted in amt, charge, office, Dutch ampt, Danish ambt. The Gothic orthography gives rise to the question whether amb, emb, and αντι, Saxon and Gothic and, are not radically the same word; and it is very certain that the Gothic and Saxon and, is radically the same word as the Latin in, Danish ind. So in Gothic, "and wigans," in the ways, into the highways; Luke xiv. 23.; "and haimos," per vicos, through the towns; Luke ix. 6.

This preposition, amb, is in Dutch om; in German um; in Swedish and Danish om.

At, is a Gothic preposition and prefix, coinciding with English at, Latin ad.

Be, in Saxon, as a preposition and prefix, is always written be, or big, answering to the English by, a preposition, and be in beset. In Gothic, it is written bi, by and be, being contractions of big. The primary and principal signification is near, close; as "Stand or sit by me." So in the word bystander. It is a prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish. Its use in denoting instrumentality, may be from the sense of nearness, but more probably it is from passing, like per, through, or it denotes proceeding from, like of, as "Salvation is of the Lord."

For, in Saxon, as in English, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. In Saxon for signifies a going, from faran, to go, to fare. It is radically the same word as fore, in the sense of in front, before. Its primary sense is advancing; hence moving toward; hence the sense of in favour of, and that of opposition, or negation. See the preceding remarks.

This word in German is für, but with this orthography, the word is little used in composition. Yet the German has furbitte, intercession or praying for; fürwort, intercession, recommendation, and a pronoun [for-word;] and für-wahr, forsooth.

In the sense of fore, the German has vor, a word of extensive use as a prefix. Thus in Saxon foreseon to foresee, is in German vorsehen. The identity of these words will not be questioned. But in German as in Dutch the preposition ver, which is the English for, and Saxon fyr, is used in composition, in words in which the Saxon and English have for. Thus forgifan, to forgive, is in German vergeben, and in Dutch vergeeven—Saxon, forgitan, to forget; German vergessen; Dutch vergeten. Hence we see that the Saxon for, fore, fyr, the English for, fore, far, and the German für, vor, and ver, are from the same radix.

In Dutch, for and fore are represented by voor, and ver represents for and far.

The Danish also unites for and fore, as does the Swedish.

The French has this word in pour, and the Spanish and Portuguese in por. The latter signifies not only for, but through, as in Portuguese, "Eu passarei por França," I will pass through France. Here we see the sense of moving. In Spanish and Portuguese this word is written also para, as if from the Greek. It is evidently the same word, probably received through a different channel from that of por. Now through is the exact sense of the Latin per; and per is the Italian preposition answering to for and por. But, what is more to the purpose, the Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese word, equivalent to the English forgive, is in Spanish perdonar; in Italian perdonare, and in Portuguese perdoar; and the French is pardonner. Here then we have strong, if not conclusive evidence, that for, pour, por, per, par, and para, in different languages, are all from one stock, the word being varied in dialect, or by the different families; just as we have far, as well as the Saxon fyr, and the English forth, further, from the same primitive word. We have the same word in pursue and purchase, from the French pour.

The Greek has περαν, and παρα, probably from the same root, as well as πορευομαι, περας.

Ga, in Gothic, which is ge in Saxon, is a prefix of very extensive use. In Saxon, it is prefixed to a large portion of all the verbs in the language. According to Lye, it has sometimes the sense of the Latin cum; but in most words we cannot discern any effect of this prefix on the signification of the simple verb. It is retained in the Danish and in some German and Dutch words, especially in the participles of verbs, and in nouns formed from them. But it is remarkable that although the Saxon is our mother tongue, we have not remaining in the language a single instance of this prefix, with the original orthography. The only remains of it are in the contraction a, as in awake, adrift, ashamed, &c. from gewæcan, awæcan; gedrifan, adrifan; gesceamian, ascamian. The letter y prefixed to verbs and participles used by Chaucer, as yberied, yblent, ybore, ydight, and a few others, is the remnant of the ge. The words yclad, and ycleped, are the last English words used in which this letter appears.

It is possible that the first syllable of govern, from Latin guberno, Greek κυβερνω, may be the same prefix; or it may be the Welsh prefix go, which occurs in goberu, to work, which the Romans wrote operor. But we know not whether the first syllable of govern is a prefix or not.

There is another word which retains this prefix corrupted, or its equivalent; this is common, which we have received from the Latin communis. This word in the Teutonic dialects is, Saxon gemæne; German gemein; Dutch gemeen; Danish gemeen; Swedish gemen. Now if this is the Latin communis, and of the identity of the last component part of the word, there can, we think, be no doubt; then the first part of the word is the Teutonic ge altered to com, or, what is more probable, com is the equivalent of ge, or ge may be a contracted and corrupted form of cum, com. In either case, we arrive at the conclusion that the Teutonic ge, and the Latin cum, are equivalent in signification.

In, is used in the Saxon and Gothic, as in modern English. It is in German ein, Dutch and Swedish in, Danish ind, Greek εν, Latin in, French en. This is radically the same word as on and un, the German an, Dutch aan, and Welsh an. In its original sense, it implies moving, advancing toward, and hence its use as a particle of negation or contrariety. "Eunt in urbem," They are going to the city. "Hæc audio in te dici," I hear these things said against you. In modern military usage, on is used in the same sense of advancing: "The army is marching on Liege."

Mid, in Saxon, signifies with. It is the Gothic mith, German mit, Dutch mede or met, and the Greek μετα; but not retained in English. It seems to have the same origin as mid, middle, amidst. In the Gothic it is used as a prefix.

Miss, a prefix, is the verb miss, to deviate. It is used in Saxon, German, Dutch, Swedish and Danish, in nearly the same sense as in English. Its radical sense is to depart or wander.

Of, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, as in English. It denotes primarily, issuing, or proceeding from; hence separation, departure, and distance: in the latter sense, it is written off. It is the Latin ab, written by the early Romans af; the Greek απο, the German ab, the Dutch af; Danish and Swedish af. The Saxons often prefixed this word in cases where we use it after the verb as a modifier; as of-drifan, to drive off; as it is still used by the Germans, Dutch, Swedes and Danes. We retain it as a prefix, in offset and off-spring, Saxon of-spring. As it denotes proceeding from, it is the proper sign of the genitive case; the case expressing production.

Ofer, English over, Gothic ufar, German über, Dutch over, Danish over, Swedish ofver, is a preposition and prefix, in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages which we have examined; and in the same or similar senses. This seems to be the Greek ὑπερ, from which the Latins formed super, by converting the aspirate of the Greek vowel into s. This is probably the Heb. Ch. Syr. Ar. עבר, to pass, a passing, beyond.

On, is a Saxon preposition and prefix of very extensive use. It is obviously a different orthography of in, and it is used for in in the Saxon, as "on onginn," in the beginning. It has also the sense we now give to on and upon, with other modifications of signification.

In composition, on signifies into, or toward, as on-blawan, to blow in; onclifian, to adhere, to cleave to; and it is also a particle of negation, like un, as onbindan, to unbind. This on is only a different spelling of un, in Dutch on, German un, used as a word of negation. The Gothic has un and und, in the like sense, as the Danish has un; the Dutch ont. In this sense, un answers precisely to the Greek αντι, and as this is sometimes written und in Gothic, as in is written ind in Danish, there can be little doubt that in, on, un, αντι, are all from one stock. The original word may have been han, hin, or hon; such loss of the first letter is very common; and inn, from the Ch. and Heb. חנה, presents us with an example. See In and Inn in the Dictionary.

The German has an, and the Dutch aan, in the sense of in and on.

Oth, is a Saxon preposition and prefix, sometimes written ath and ed, and answering nearly to the Latin ad and re; as in oth-witan, contracted, to twit, to throw in the teeth. It has also the sense of from, or away, or against, as in othswerian, to abjure. This preposition is obsolete, but we have the remains of it in twit, and perhaps in a few other words.

Sam, samod, a prefix. See the Danish and Swedish infra.

To, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use in our mother tongue. It occurs as a prefix in such words as, to-brœcan, to break; to-beran, to bring or bear [ad-ferre.] We retain it in together, Saxon togœdere; and in toward, Saxon toward, towardes; and in tomorrow, today, tonight. The Dutch write it toe, and the Germans zu, and both nations use it extensively as a prefix. In Gothic it is written du, as in du-ginnan, to gin, that is, to begin. It would be gratifying to learn whether the Ethiopic ተ, which is prefixed to many verbs, is not the remains of the same preposition.

Un, is a Saxon prefix of extensive use, as a privative or particle of negation. See On and In.

Under, is a Saxon preposition and prefix of considerable use, in the present English sense. The Germans write it unter, and the Dutch onder, and use it in like manner. The Danes and Swedes write it under, and use it in the same sense.

Up, uppe, is a Saxon preposition and prefix of considerable use, in the present English sense. The Gothic has uf, in the sense of the Latin sub. The Germans write it auf and the Dutch op, the Danes op, and the Swedes up, and all use it as a prefix.

Us, in Gothic, is a preposition and prefix. This is the German aus, and equivalent to the Latin ex. It is the Saxon ut, the English out, Dutch uit, Swedish ut, and Danish ud, dialectically varied. To this answers the Welsh ys, used in composition, but ys seems rather to be a change of the Latin ex, for the Latin expello is written in Welsh yspeliaw, and extendo is estyn.

Wither, in Saxon, from the root of with, denotes against, or opposition. It is a prefix in Saxon, written in German wider, in Dutch weder; Danish and Swedish veder. It is obsolete, but retained in the old law term withernam, a counter-taking or distress.

In the German language, there are some prepositions and prefixes not found in the Saxon; as,

Ent, denoting from, out, away.

Er, without, out or to. Danish er.

Nach, properly nigh, as in nachbar, neighbour; but its most common signification in composition is after; as in nachgehen, to go after. This sense is easily deducible from its primary sense, which is close, near, from urging, pressing, or following. In Dutch, this word is contracted to na, as in nabuur, neighbour; nagaan, to follow. The Russ has na also, a prefix of extensive use, and probably the same word. This fact suggests the question, whether the ancestors of these great families of men had not their residence in the same or an adjoining territory. It deserves also to be considered whether this na, is not the Shemitic נ, occurring as a prefix to verbs.

Weg, is a prefix used in the German and Dutch. It is the Saxon, German, and Dutch weg, way; in the sense of away, or passing from, from the verb, in Saxon wœgan, wegan, to carry, to weigh, English to wag, the sense of which is to move or pass; as German wegfallen, to fall off or away.

Zer, in German, denotes separation.

In the Gothic dialects, Danish and Swedish, fra is used as a prefix. This is the Scottish fra or frae, English from, of which it may be a contraction.

Fram in Swedish, and frem in Danish, is also a prefix. The primary sense is to go, or proceed, and hence it denotes moving to or toward, forth, &c. as in Danish, fremforer, to bring forth; fremkalder, to call for. But in Danish, fremmed is strange, foreign, and it is probable that the English from is from the same root, with a different application. It may be from the same stock as the Gothic fram, origin, beginning, Latin primus, signifying to shoot forth, to extend, to pass along.

Gen, igien, in Danish, and igen, in Swedish, is the English gain in again, against. This is a prefix in both these Gothic languages. It has the sense of the Latin re, as in igienkommer, to come back, to return; of against, as in igienkalder, to countermand, or recall; of again, as gienbinder, to bind again. This may be the Latin con.

Mod, in Danish, and mot, emot, in Swedish, is a preposition, signifying to, toward, against, contrary, for, by, upon, out, &c.; as "mod staden," toward the city; modstrider, to resist; modgift, an antidote: modbör, a contrary wind; modvind, the same. This is the English meet, in the Gothic orthography, motgan, to meet, whence to moot.

O, in Swedish, is a negative or privative prefix, as in otidig, immature, in English, not tidy. It is probably a contracted word.

Paa, in Danish, på in Swedish, is a preposition and prefix, signifying on, in, upon. Whether this is allied to be, by, and the Russ po, we shall not undertake to determine with confidence; but it probably is the same, or from the same source.

Samman, signifying together, and from the root of assemble, is a prefix of considerable use in both languages. It answers to the Saxon sam, samod, equivalent to the Latin con or cum. It seems to be allied to same and the Latin similis.

Til, both in Danish and Swedish, is a prefix, and in Danish, of very extensive use. It is equivalent to the English to or toward, and signifies also at, in, on, by, and about, and in composition often has the sense of back or re, as in tilbage, backward, that is, to back; but generally it retains the sense of to or onward; as in tilbyder, to offer, that is, to speak or order to; tildriver, to drive on; tilgiver, to allow, to pardon, that is, to give to, and hence to give back, to remit. This is the English till, which we use in the same sense as the Danes, but in English it always refers to time, whereas in Danish and Swedish, it refers to place. Thus we cannot say, "We are going till town:" but we say, "Wait till I come, till my arrival;" literally, "Wait to I come, to my arrival;" that is, to the time of arrival. The difference is not in the sense of the preposition, but in its application.

The Scotch retain the Danish and Swedish use of this word; no slight evidence of their origin.

U, in Danish, the Swedish O, is a prefix, equivalent to in, and is used as a privative or negative; as in uaar, an unseasonable year; uartig, uncivil.

RUSSIAN.

Vo or ve, signifies in, at, by, and may possibly be from the same root as the English be, by. But see po.

Za, is a prefix signifying for, on account of, by reason of, after; as in zariduyu, to envy, from vid, visage; viju, to see, Latin video; zadirayu, from deru, to tear; zamirayu, to be astonished or stupefied, from the root of Latin miror, and Russian mir, peace; miryu, to pacify, to reconcile; mirnie, pacific; zamirenie, peace, pacification; zamiriayu, to make peace; Arm. miret, to hold, to stop; the radical sense of wonder, astonishment, and of peace.

Ko, a preposition, signifying to, toward, for.

Na, a preposition and prefix, signifying on, upon, at, for, to, seems to be the German nach, Dutch na; as in nagrada, recompense; na, and the root of Latin gratia; nasidayu, to sit down, &c.

Nad, a preposition, signifying above or upon.

O, a preposition, signifying of or from, and for.

Ob, a preposition and prefix, signifying to, on, against, about; as obnemayu, to surround, to embrace; ob and Saxon neman, to take.

Ot, is a preposition, signifying from, and it may be the English out.

Po, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying in, by, after, from, &c. as podayu, to give to; polagayu, to lay, to expend, employ, lay out; to tax or assess; to establish or fix; to believe or suppose; po and lay. This corresponds with English by, and the Latin has it in possideo, and a few other words. [Saxon besittan.] Pomen, remembrance, po and mens, mind.

Rad, a preposition, signifying for, or for the love of.

So, a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying with, of, from; and as a mark of comparison, it answers nearly to the English so or as.

Y, with the sound of u, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. It signifies near, by, at, with, as uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to cut, to reap, to mow, to dress, French parer, Latin paro; ugoda, satisfaction; ugodnei, good, useful, English good; udol, a dale, from dol.

WELSH.

The prefixes in the Welsh language are numerous. The following are the principal.

Am, about, encompassing, Saxon amb, Greek αμφι.

An. See Saxon In.

Cy, cyd, cyr, cym, implying union, and answering to cum, con and co in Latin. Indeed cym, written also cyv, seems to be the Latin cum, and cy may be a contraction of it, like co in Latin. Cu seems also to be a prefix, as in caboli, to polish, Latin polio.

Cyn, cyat, former, first, as if allied to begin.

Di, negative and privative.

Dis, negative and precise.

Dy, iterative

E and ec, adversative.

Ed and eil, denoting repetition, like re, Saxon ed, oth.

Es, separating, like Latin ex. See ys.

Go, extenuating, inchoative, approaching, going, denotes diminution or a less degree, like the Latin sub; as in gobrid, somewhat dear. This seems to be from the root of English go.

Han, expressive of origination.

Lled, partly, half.

Oll, all.

Rhag, before.

Rhy, over, excessive.

Tra, over, beyond. Latin trans.

Try, through.

Ym, mutual, reflective.

Ys, denoting from, out of, separation, proceeding from, answering to the Latin ex; as ysgelsaw, to expel. So es, Welsh estyn, to extend.

Most of these prepositions, when used as prefixes, are so distinct as to be known to be prefixes.

But in some instances, the original preposition is so obscured by a loss or change of letters, as not to be obvious nor indeed discoverable, without resorting to an ancient orthography. Thus without the aid of the Saxon orthography, we should probably not be able to detect the component parts of the English twit. But in Saxon it is written edwitan and othwitan; the preposition or prefix oth, with witan, to disallow, reproach, or cast in the teeth.

It has been above suggested to be possible, that in the Shemitic languages, the נ in triliteral roots, may be the same prefix as the Russian na, the Dutch na, and the German nach. Let the reader attend to the following words.

Hebrew נבט, to look, to behold, to regard. The primary sense of look, is, to reach, extend, or throw.

Ch., to look; also to bud or sprout.

Ar. نَبَطَ nabata, to spring, or issue as water; to flow out; to devise or strike out; to draw out.

If the first letter is a prefix, the Hebrew word would accord with Latin video; the Chaldee, with video and with bud, Spanish botar, French bouton, bouter, to put, and English to pout, and French bout, end, from shooting, extending.

Ar. نَبَتَ nabatha, to bud; to germinate. See Ch. supra.

Heb. נבל naval, to fall; to sink down; to wither; to fall off, as leaves and flowers; to act foolishly; to disgrace. Derivative, foolish; a fool; נפל nafal, Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. to fall.

Ch. נבל nabal, to make foul; to defile; that is, to throw or put on.

Ar. نَبَلَ nabala, to shoot, as an arrow; to drive as camels; to excel; also to die, that is, probably, to fall.

Can there be any question, that fall, foul, and fool are this very word, without the first consonant? The Arabic without the first consonant agrees with Gr. βαλλω, and the sense of falling then, is to throw one's self down.

Heb. נטר natar, to keep, guard, preserve, retain, observe.

Ch., to observe; to keep; to lay up.

Syr. and Sam. id.

Eth. ነጠረ natar, to shine.

Ar. نَظَرَ natara, to keep; to see; to look; to attend.

Remove the first letter, and this coincides with the Greek τηρεω.

No person will doubt whether נמל namal, to circumcise, is formed on מול mul.

Ch. נסר nasar, to cut; to saw. Syr. id. Lat. serra, serro.

Ar. نَفِدَ nafida, to fade, to vanish, to perish, to be empty, to fail.

Heb. נפח nafach, to blow, to breathe. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar. id. from פוח, fuch, to blow.

If the Shemitic נ in these and similar words is a prefix or the remains of a preposition, it coincides very closely with the Russ. and Dutch na, and the latter we know to be a contraction of the German nach. Now the German nach is the English nigh; for no person can doubt the identity of the German nachbar and the English neighbour.

In the course of our investigations, we very early began to suspect that b, f, p, c, g and k, before l and r, are either casual letters, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, or the remains of prepositions; most probably the latter. We had advanced far in the Dictionary, with increasing evidence of the truth of this conjecture, before we had received Owen's Dictionary of the Welsh language. An examination of this work has confirmed our suspicions, or rather changed them into certainty.

If we attend to the manner of articulating the letters, and the ease with which bl, br, fl, fr, gl, pr, cl, cr, gl, gr are pronounced, without an intervening vowel, even without a sheva, we shall not be surprised that a preposition or prefix, like be, pe, pa, po, or ge, should, in a rapid pronunciation, lose its vowel, and the consonant coalesce closely with the first letter of the principal word. Thus blank, prank, might naturally be formed from belank, perank. That these words are thus formed, we do not know; but there is nothing in the composition of the words to render it improbable. Certain it is, that a vast number of words are formed with these prefixes, on other words, or the first consonant is a mere adventitious addition; for they are used with or without the first consonant. Take the following examples:—

Hiberno-Celtic, or Irish, brac or brach, the arm, is written also raigh, Welsh braiç, whence βραχιων, brachium. Braigh, the neck, Sax. hraca, Eng. rack, Gr. ραχις. Fraoch, heath, ling, brake, L. erica.

Welsh llawr, Basque lurra, Eng. floor.

Lat. floccus, Eng. flock or lock.

Sax. hraccan, Eng. to reach, in vomiting.*

Sax. hracod, Eng. ragged.

---

* H before l and r in Saxon corresponds to the Greek κ, and Latin c, before the same letters.

Ger. rock, Eng. frock.
Dutch geluk, Ger. gluck, Eng. luck.
Greek, Eolic dialect, βροδον, for ροδον, a rose.
Latin clunis, Eng. loin, G. lende, W. clun, from llun.
Eng. cream, Ger. rahm, Dutch room.
Sax. hlaf, Polish chlieb, G. leib, Eng. loaf.
Sax. hladan, Eng. to lade or load, Russ. kladu, to lay.
Greek κλινω, Lat. clino, Sax. hlinian, hleonan, Russ. klonyu, Eng. to lean.
Greek λαγηνος, Lat. lagena, Eng. flagon.
Sax. hrysan, Eng. to rush.
French frapper, Eng. to rap.
Sax. geræedian, to make ready; in Chaucer, greith, to make ready. Sax. hræd, quick; hradian, to hasten; hrædnes, Eng. readiness.
Spanish frisar, to curl or frizzle; rizar, the same.
Sax. gerefa, Eng. reeve, G. graf, D. graaf.
Lat. glycyrrhiza, from the Greek; Eng. liquorice.

But in no language have we such decisive evidence of the formation of words by prefixes, as in the Welsh.

Take the following instances, from a much greater number that might be produced, from Owen's Welsh Dictionary.

Blanc, a colt, from llanc.
Blith, milk, from lith.
Bliant, fine linen, from lliant.
Plad, a flat piece or plate, from llad.
Pled, a principle of extension, from lled.
Pledren, a bladder, from pledyr, that distends, from lled.
Pleth, a braid, from lleth, Eng. plait.
Plicciaw, to pluck, from llig.
Ploc, a block, from lloc; plociaw, to block, to plug.
Plwng, a plunge, from llwng, our vulgar lunge.
Glwth, a glutton, from llwth.
Glas, a blue colour, verdancy, a green plat, whence Eng. glass, from llas.
Glyd, gluten, glue, from llyd.
Claer, clear, from llaer.
Clav, sick, from llav.
Clwpa, a club, a knob, from llwb.
Clwt, a piece, a clout, from llwd, llwt.
Clamp, a mass, a lump.
Clawd, a thin board, from llawd.
Cledyr, a board or shingle, whence cledrwy, lattice, from lled.
Bran, Eng. bran, from rhan; rhanu, to rend.
Brid, a breaking out, from rhid.
Broç, noise, tumult, a brock, from rhoç.
Broç, froth, foam, anger, broçi, to chafe or fret, from rhwc, a boiling or ferment, from rhwc, something rough, a grunt, Gr. βρυχω.
Bryd, what moves, impulse, mind, thought, from rhyd.
Brys, quickness, brisiaw, to hasten, to shoot along, from rhys, Eng. to rush, and crysiaw, to hasten, from rhys, to rush. [Here is the same word rhys, with different prefixes, forming brysiaw and crysiaw. Hence W. brysg, Eng. brisk.]
Graz, [pronounced grath,] a step, a degree, from rhaz, Lat. gradus, gradior.
Greg, a cackling, from rheg.
Grem, a crashing, gnash, a murmur, gremiaw, to crash or gnash, from rhem. Hence Lat. fremo, Gr. βρεμω.*

We have some instances of similar words in our own language; such are flag and lag; flap and lap; clump and lump.

There is another class of words which are probably formed with a prefix of a different kind. We refer to words in which s precedes another consonant, as scalp, skull, slip, slide, sluggish, smoke, smooth, speed, spire, spin, stage, steep, stem, swell, spout. We find that tego, to cover, in Latin, is in Greek στεγω; the Latin fallo, is in Greek σφαλλω. We find μαραγδος is written also σμαραγδος; and it may be inquired whether the English spin, is not from the same root as πηνη, web or woof, πηνιον, a spindle, πηνιζω, to spin. Sprout in English is in Spanish brota.

We find the Welsh ysbrig, the English sprig, is a compound of ys, a prefix denoting issuing or proceeding from, like the Lat. ex, and brig, top, summit.

Ysgar, a separate part, a share; ysgar, ysgarv, to divide; ysgariaw, to separate, is composed of ys and car, according to Owen; but the real root appears distinctly in the Gr. κειρω. This is the English shear, shire.

Ysgegiaw, to shake by laying hold of the throat, to shake roughly, is a compound of ys and cegiaw, to choke, from ceg, the mouth, an entrance, a choking. This may be the English shake; Sax. sceacan.

Ysgin, a robe made of skin; ys and cin, a spread or covering.

Ysgodi, to shade; ysgawd, a shade; ys and cawd.

Ysgrab, what is drawn up or puckered, a scrip; ys and crab, what shrinks. See Eng. crab, crabbed.

Ysgravu, to scrape; ys and crav, claws, from rhav.

Ysgreç, a scream, a shriek, ysgreçiaw, to shriek, from creç, a shriek, creçian, to shriek, from creg, cryg, hoarse, rough, from rhyg, rye, that is, rough; the grain so named from its roughness. This is the English rough, Lat. raucus. Here we have the whole process of formation, from the root of rough. We retain the Welsh creçian, to shriek, in our common word, to creak, and with a formative prefix, we have shriek, and our vulgar screak. The Latin ruga, a wrinkle, Eng. rug, shrug, are probably from the same source.

Ysgrivenu, to write, Lat. scribo, from ysgriv, a writing, from criv, a mark cut, a row of notches; criviaw, to cut, to grave; from rhiv, something that divides. Hence scrivener.

Ysgub, a sheaf or besom, ysgubaw, to sweep, Lat. scopæ, from cub, a collection, a heap, a cube.

Ysgud, something that whirls; ysgudaw, to whisk or scud; from cud, celerity, flight; ysguth, ysguthaw, the same.

Ysgwth, a push; ysgwthiaw, to push or thrust; from gwth, gwthiaw, the same; probably allied to Eng. shoot. The Welsh has ysgytha, to jet or spout, from the same root.

Yslac, slack, loose; yslaciaw, to slacken; from llac, loose, slack, llaciaw, to slacken, from llag, slack, sluggish; allied to Eng. lag and slow.

Yslapiaw, to slap, to flap, from yslab, what is lengthened or distended, from llab, a flag, a strip, a stroke. Llabi, a tall, lank person, a stripling, a looby, a lubber, is from the same root; llabiaw, to slap.

Ysled, a sled, from lled, says Owen, which denotes breadth, but it is probably from the root of slide, a word probably from the same root as lled, that is, to extend, to stretch along.

Ysmot, a patch, a spot; ysmotiaw, to spot, to dapple, from mod, Eng. mote.

Ysmwciaw, ysmygu, to dim with smoke, from mwg, smoke. So smooth, from Welsh mwyth.

Yspail, spoil, from pail, farina, says Owen. We should say from the root of palea, straw, refuse, that is, from the root of peel, to strip. Yspeiliota, to be pilfering.

* We do not follow Owen to the last step of his analysis, as we are of opinion that, in making monosyllabic words to be compound, he often errs. For example, he supposes broç, a tumult, to be from rhoç, a broken or rough utterance; a grunt or groan; and this, to be a compound of rhy, excess, what is over or beyond, and oç, a forcible utterance, a groan. We believe rhoç to be a primitive uncompounded word, coinciding with the English rough.

Owen supposes plad, a flat thing, a plate, to be from llad, with py. Llad he explains, what is given, a gift, good things, and py, what is inward or involved. We have no doubt that the first letter is a prefix in plad, but beyond all question, llad is from the same root as lled, breadth, coinciding with Lat. latus; both from a common root signifying to extend. But we do not believe llad or lled to be compound words.

Dug, a duke, Owen supposes to be formed on ug, over; which cannot be true, unless the Latin dux, duco, are compounds. Dur, steel, he derives from ur, extreme, over, but doubtless it is from the root of the Latin durus.

So par, signifying what is contiguous, a state of readiness or preparation, a pair, fellow, or match, Owen makes a compound of py, and ar; py, as above explained, and ar, a word of various significations, on, upon, surface, &c. But there can be no doubt that par is from the root of the Latin paro, to prepare, being the Latin par, equal; the root of a numerous family of words not only in the Japhetic languages of Europe, but in the Shemitic languages of Asia. It certainly is not a Welsh compound, nor is there the least evidence to induce a belief that it is not an uncompounded word. Had the learned author of the Welsh Dictionary extended his researches to a variety of other languages, and compared the monosyllabic roots in them with each other, we think he would have formed a very different opinion as to their origin. We are very well convinced that many of the words which he supposes to be primitive or radical, are contractions, such as rhy, lle, lly, the last consonant being lost.

Yspeliaw, to expel, from pel, a ball, says Owen: but this is the Latin expello, from pello. Ball may be from the same root.

Yspig, a spike, a spine; yspigaw, to spike; from pig, a sharp point, a pike. Hence Eng. spigot.

Yspin, a spine, from pin, pen.

Ysgynu, to ascend, Lat. ascendo, from cyn, first, chief, foremost. The radical sense is to shoot up.

Yslwç, a slough, from llwc, a collection of water, a lake.

Yspar, a spear, from pâr, a cause or principle of producing, the germ or seed of a thing, a spear. This consists of the same elements as ber, a spit, and Eng. bar, and in Italian bar is sbarra. The primary sense is to shoot, thrust, drive.

Yspinc, a finch, from pinc, gay, fine, brisk; a sprig, a finch.

Ysplan, clear, bright; ysplana, to explain; from plan, that is parted off, a ray, a shoot, a planting, a plane; whence plant, a child; Eng. a plant; planu, to shoot, as a plant. Hence splendour, W. ysplander.

Ysporthi, to support, from porth, a bearing, a port, passage, &c. Lat. porta, porto.

Ystac, a stack, a heap; ystaca, a standard; from tag, a state of being stuffed or clogged.

Ystad, a state; ystadu, to stay; from tad, that spreads, a continuity. The primary sense is to set.

Ystain, that is spread; a stain; tin, Lat. stannum; ystaeniaw, to spread over, to stain; ystaenu, to tin, or cover with tin; from taen, a spread, a layer. Qu. is tin from spreading?

Ystawl, a stool, from tawl, a cast or throw. The sense is to set, to throw down. Tawl is the root of deal.

Ystor, a store, that forms a bulk, from tor, a swell, a prominence.

Ystorm, a storm, from torm, that is stretched, but the sense is a rushing.

Ystrym, a stream, from trym, compact, trim, that is, stretched, straight, from extending.

Ystwmp, a stump, from twmp, a round mass, a tump.

Yswatiaw, to squat, from yswad, a throw, or falling down, from gwad, a denial; gwadu, to deny or disown. If this deduction is correct, the sense of denial is a throwing or thrusting back, a repelling. It is so in other words.

Yswitiaw, to chirp, twitter, from yswid, that makes a quick turn. Qu. twitter.

In some of the foregoing words it appears evident that the Welsh prefix ys, is an alteration of the Latin ex, and the words in which this is the case, were probably borrowed from the Latin, while the Roman armies had possession of England. But there is a vast number of words, with this prefix, which are not of Latin origin; and whether ys is a native prefix in the Welsh, may be a question. One thing is certain, that s before another consonant, and coalescing with it, is, in a great number of words, a prefix.

The modern Italian affords abundant proof of the extensive use of s, as the remains or representative of ex; as sballare, to unpack, unbale; sbarbato, beardless; sbattere, to abate; sbrancare, to pluck off branches; scaricare, to discharge; scommodare, to incommode; sconcordia, discord: scornare, to break the horns; scrostare, to pull off the crust; and a great number of others.

Now if the same manner of forming words with this prefix has actually prevailed among the northern nations of Europe, we may rationally suppose that many English words, and perhaps all of this class, are thus formed. Thus scatter may be formed from a root in Cd; shape, from Cb, Cf, or Cp; skill, from the root of Lat. calleo; slip, from the root of Lat. labor; smart, from the root of Lat. amarus, bitter. Heb. מר; smite, from the root of Latin mitto; span, from the root of pan, to stretch; spar, from the root of bar; speak, from the root of Lat. voco; speed, from a root in Pd, perhaps Lat. peto; steal, from the root of Lat. tollo; steep, from the root of deep; stretch, from the root of reach; sweep, from the root of wipe; swan, from wan, white; swell, from the root of to well, Sax. wellan, to boil, &c. That many English and other Teutonic and Gothic words are thus formed, appears to be certain.

These facts being admitted, let us examine a little further. In Russ. svadiba, is a wedding. Is not this formed on the root of wed, with s for a prefix? Svara, is a quarrel. Is not this formed on the root of vary, variance, or of spar? Sverlo, is a borer; qu. bore and veru; svertivayu, to roll; qu. Lat. verto; skora, furs, peltry; qu. Fr. cuir; skot, a beast; qu. cattle; skupayu, to purchase in gross; qu. cheap, Dan. kioben, and its root; slabei, weak; qu. Lat. labor, lapsus; slagayu, to fold; qu. lay, and plico; slivayu, to pour out liquors; qu. Lat. libo; slupayu, to peel off bark or skin; qu. Lat. liber; snimayu, to take away; qu. Sax. neman, to take; snova, new; qu. Lat. novus; snig, sneig, snow, Fr. neige. The Lat. nivis is from this root, with g opened to v. Russ. spletayu, to plait, &c.

The Russ. prefix so, occurs in a great number of words; sobirayu, to collect or assemble, precisely the Heb. and Ch. צבר.

It now becomes an interesting question, to determine how far any analogy exists between the languages of the Japhetic and Shemitic families in regard to prefixes. For example, in the Shemitic languages, ב is a prefix of extensive use, corresponding almost exactly with the English and Dutch by, the Saxon be, and German bei. This preposition and prefix has several senses in the Saxon which are now obsolete; but its present prevailing sense occurs in all the Shemitic languages. ברוח קדים עזה, by a strong east wind; Ex. xiv. 21. Compare the following definitions of this preposition; the Sax. from Lye, and the Shemitic from Castle.

Sax. de, e, ex, in, secus, ad, juxta, secundum, pro, per, super, propter, circa.

Heb. Ch. Syr. in, a, ex, cum, propter, usque ad, adeo ut, ad, super, per, contra, ante.

Eth. en, per, pro, propter, cum, secundum, apud.

Ar. in, cum, propter, per, ad, erga.

In Numbers, xiv. 34, it signifies according to, or after; במספר הימים, according to the number of days. This signification is now perhaps obsolete in English, but was common in the Saxon; as, "be his mægnum," according to his strength; pro viribus suis. So "be tham mæstan," by the most, is now expressed by, at the most.

Now it is remarkable that this word in Hebrew, Arabic, and Persic, is the preposition used in oaths, precisely as it is in English; Gen. xxii. 16, בי. By myself have I sworn. Arabic, ballah or by Allah; Persic, بخدا bechoda, or begoda, by God, the very words now used in English. The evidence, then, is decisive, that the Shemitic prefix ב is the Teutonic be, by, bei, contracted, and this Teutonic word is certainly a contraction of big, which is used in the Saxon, especially in compound words, as in bigspell, [by-spell,] a fable; bigstandan, to stand by. This prefix, then, was in universal use by the original stock of mankind, before the dispersion; and this word alone is demonstrative proof of the common origin of the Shemitic and Teutonic languages. Now it is equally certain that this is the prefix b, and probably p, before l and r, in block, braigh, and a multitude of words in all the modern languages; and probably, the same letter is a prefix in many Shemitic words.

We know that be in the Saxon bedælan, and Dutch bedeelen, is a prefix, as the simple verb is found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages. The Hebrew and Chaldee בדל corresponds exactly in elements and in signification with the Saxon and Dutch. Whether the first letter is a prefix in the latter languages, let the reader judge. See the word deal, which, when traced, terminates in the Welsh tawl, a cast off, a throw; separation; tawlu, to cast or throw off, to separate.

In Chaldee, בדר badar, signifies to scatter, to disperse. The word has the same signification in the Syriac and Samaritan.

In Ethiopic, the word with ሰ prefixed, signifies to wish, love, desire, and with ተ prefixed, to strive, to endeavour, and without a prefix, strife, course, race. Both these significations are from stretching, straining.

In Arabic, بدر badara, signifies generally to hasten, to run to; but بذر bathara, signifies to disperse, to sow or scatter seed.

This verb is written in Hebrew בזר, with precisely the same signification. The Arabic also has the verb with this orthography signifying to sow, and also to beat or strike with a stick.

Now in Syriac ܕܪ dar, signifies to strive, or struggle. Here we have the simple verb, without the prefix, with the sense of the Ethiopic, with a prefix. Supra.

We find also the Arabic ذرّ tharra, the simple verb, signifies to sprinkle.

We find in Chaldee דרא דרה and דרי, the simple verb, signifies to disperse; in Syriac, the same. In Arabic ذرأ tharau, signifies to sow, like the foregoing verb, and hence to procreate. Both this and the former verb signify also to whiten, as the hair of the head, as we say, to sprinkle with gray hairs. The Arabic درأ dara, signifies to drive, to impel, to repel, to contend, to strive; to shine, to sparkle. And here we have the literal signification of this whole class of verbs; to drive, urge, throw, send; hence to scatter, to strive, to shoot as rays of light, procreate, &c.

The Hebrew corresponding verb is זרה or זרע, to scatter, to sow; and the word with the like orthography occurs in Ch. Syr. and Ar. This is the Latin sero. And who can doubt that ב is a prefix in the verb בדר above mentioned?

In Welsh, goberu signifies to work, to operate: gober, work, operation; formed by the prefix go and per; go denoting progress toward, approach, and per rendered by Owen, that pervades, a fruit, a pear; but the real sense is to strain, to bring forth, to drive, thrust, urge, &c.

This word, in the Armoric dialect, is written either gober or ober; in Latin operor, whence Eng. operate. The same word is in the Ethiopic, ገበረ gaber, to make, to do; አገበረ agabar, to cause to be made; ተገበረ tagabar, to work, operate, negotiate; ገባሪ gabar, a maker.

This is the Heb. and Ch. גבר, to be strong, to prevail, to establish, and as a noun, a man; Ar. جبر jabara, to make strong, to heal, as, a broken bone; to strengthen.

That this Shemitic word and the Welsh and Ethiopic are all radically one, there cannot be a question; and the Welsh proves indisputably that go is a prefix. This, then, is a word formed on בר or ברא. The Heb. אביר, strong, that is, strained, and אבר, a wing, that is, a shoot, are from the same root, and in Arabic ابر abara, signifies to prick, to sting, and its derivatives, the extremity of a thing, a point, a needle, corresponding with the Welsh bar, a summit, a tuft, a branch, a bar, and the Welsh ber, a pike, a lance, a spit, a spear, Lat. veru; in Welsh, also, pâr, a spear, and per, a spit, are all doubtless of the same origin.

In Syriac, ܨܒܪ tsabar, signifies to make, to work or operate. Is this the same root with a different prefix?

The same word in Arabic, صبر tsabara, signifies to be patient, to bear, to sustain.

We observe, that in the Teutonic and Gothic languages, the same word is used with different prefixes. Thus in our mother tongue, begin is written gynnan, the simple radical word, and aginnan, beginnan, and ongynnan; and in the Gothic, duginnan, which, in English, would be togin.

Should it appear upon investigation, that verbs in the Assyrian languages have the same prefixes which occur in the European languages, the fact will evidence more affinity between the languages of these two stocks than has yet been known to exist.

Let us now attend to the natural causes which may be supposed to have obscured or destroyed the identity or resemblance of languages which had a common origin.

The affinity of words, in two or more different languages, is known by identity of letters and identity of signification; or by letters of the same organ, and a signification obviously deducible from the same sense. Letters of the same organ, as for example, b, f, p and v, are so easily converted, the one into the other, and the change is so frequent, that this circumstance seldom occasions much obscurity. The changes of signification occasion more difficulty, not so much by necessity, as because this branch of philology is less understood.

1. CHANGE OF CONSONANTS WHICH REPRESENT THE ARTICULATIONS OF THE ORGANS OF SPEECH.

Consonants are the stamina of words. They are convertible and frequently converted into their cognates. The English word bear, represents the Latin fero and pario, and fero is the Greek φερω. The Latin ventus is wind in English; and habeo is have. The Latin dens, in Dutch, Danish and Swedish is tand; and dance in English is in German tanz.

These changes are too familiar to require a multiplication of examples. But there are others less common and obvious, which are yet equally certain. Thus in the Gaelic or Hiberno-Celtic, m and mb are convertible with v; and in Welsh m and v are changed, even in different cases of the same word. Thus in Irish the name of the hand is written either lamh or lav, and in Welsh maen, a stone, is written also vaen. The Greek β is always pronounced as the English v, as βουλομαι, Lat. volo, English will, German wollen; and the sound of b the Greeks express by μβ.

In the Chaldee and Hebrew, one remarkable distinction is the use of a dental letter in the former, where the latter has a sibilant. As כות cuth in Chaldee, is כוש cush in Hebrew; דהב, gold in Chaldaic, is זהב in Hebrew. The like change appears in the modern languages; for water, which in most of the northern languages is written with a dental, is in German written wasser; and the Latin dens, W. dant, Dutch tand, Swedish and Danish tand, is in German zahn. The like change is frequent in the Greek and Latin. Φραττω, in one dialect, is φρασσω, in another; and the Latins often changed t of the indicative present, or infinitive, into s in the preterit and participle, as mitto, mittere, misi, missus.

L and r, though not considered as letters of the same organ, are really such and changed the one into the other. Thus the Spaniards write blandir for brandish, and escolta for escort The Portuguese write brando for bland, and branquear, to whiten, for blanch. The Greek has φραγελλιον for the Latin flagellum. In Europe, however, this change seems to be limited chiefly to two or three nations on the coast of the Mediterranean. L is sometimes commutable with d.

We have a few instances of the change of g or gh into f. Thus rough is pronounced ruf, and trough, trauf.

The Russian often change the d of a noun into the sound of j, or the compound g, in the verb formed from that noun; as lad, accord, harmony; laju, to accord or agree; vred, damage, loss; vreju, to injure.

The Italians and French have also changed a dental into a palatal letter, in many words; as Italian raggio, a ray, from Lat. radius; and ragione, reason, from ratio; Fr. manger, to eat, from Lat. mando, or manduco.

In the south of Europe, the Greek χ has been changed, in some instances, into the Italian or Spanish z, and then by the French into s. It seems that the Spanish z has, at some former period, been pronounced as a guttural. Thus the Gr. βραχιων, Lat. brachium, the arm, is in Spanish brazo, and the Spaniards have the word from the Latin, or from the same source as the Latin and Greek, the Celtic braiç. This word, brazo, the French changed into bras, and from that we have brace and embrace. A similar change occurs in Durazzo, from Dyrrachium, and in the Spanish luz, light.

The Teutonic nations often used h to express the power of the Greek κ, and the Latin c, as heart for καρδια, horn for cornu. Hence we find that the Saxon hlinian, hleonian or hlynian, to lean, is the Greek κλινω, Latin clino. The letter h is now dropped, and we write the worn lean.

In like manner, the Saxon hlid, which we now write lid, is from the same root as the Latin clando, cludo, the Greek κλειδοω, which is contracted into κλειω. And in this word we may notice another fact, that the word signifies not only to shut, but to praise or celebrate, proving that this word and the original word is in the Gaelic and Irish, agalla. So γ is prefixed to another palatal or guttural letter in αγχω, εγχος, εγγιζω.

A similar nasal sound of g probably introduced the n before g in lingo, to lick; linquo, to leave.

We may be confident, in all cases, that n is not radical, when it is dropped in the supine and participle, as in lictum, lictus, from linquo. When n is retained in the supine and participle, there may be more reason for doubt; but in this case, the question may often be determined by the corresponding word in another language, or by some other word evidently of the same family. Thus we can have little doubt that lingo and the English lick are the same word, or that the Lat. lingua and ligula are of one family.

This casual insertion of n in words of this class must be carefully noticed by the etymologist, or he will overlook the affinity of words which are evidently the same. We have many words in English which are written with n before a g or a k, when the ancient words in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, and some of them in the modern Danish and Swedish, are written without n. Thus sink, in Gothic is sigcwan; to think, is thagkyan. It is not improbable that the Gothic word was pronounced with the sound of n or ng, as in English. So also in sigguan, to sing; laggs, long. In a few instances we find the Swedes and Danes have the word written in both ways, as tanka, tænker and tycka, tykker, to think. But in general the Germans, Danes, Swedes, and Dutch write words of this sort with ng.

To show how important it is to know the true original orthography, we will mention one instance. In our mother tongue the word to dye, or colour, is written deagan; the elements or radical letters are dg. To determine whether this and the Latin tingo are the same words, we must first know whether n in tingo is radical or casual. This we cannot know with certainty, by the form of the word itself, for the n is carried through all the tenses and forms of the verb. But by looking into the Greek, we find the word written with γ, τεγγω; and this clearly proves the alliance of the word with deagan. See DYE in the Dictionary.

We have many English words, in which a d has been inserted before g, as in badge, budge, lodge, pledge, wedge. In all words, we believe, of this class, the d is casual, and the g following is the radical letter, as pledge from the French pleige; wedge from the Saxon wecg. The practice of inserting d in words of this sort seems to have originated in the necessity of some mode of preserving the English sound of g, which might otherwise be sounded as the French g before e. And it is for this reason we still retain and ought to retain d in alledge, abridge. In like manner the Teutonic c has been changed into the sound of ch, as Sax. wacian, wæcian, to wake, to watch; Sax. thac, thatch.

There are some nations which, in many words, pronounce and write g before u or w; as in the French guerre, for war; guede, for woad; guetter, for wait; in Welsh, gwal, for wall; gwain, for wain; gwared, for guard, which in English is ward, Sp. guarda. In some instances, the u or w is dropped in modern writing, as in the French garenne, a warren; garde, for guard. This difference of orthography makes it difficult, in some cases, to ascertain the true radical letters.

CHANGE OF SIGNIFICATION.

Another cause of obscurity in the affinity of languages, and one that seems to have been mostly overlooked, is, the change of the primary sense of the radical verb. In most cases, this change consists in a slight deflection, or difference of application, which has obtained among different families of the same stock. In some cases, the literal sense is lost or obscured, and the figurative only is retained. The first object, in such cases, is to find the primary or literal sense, from which the various particular applications may be easily deduced. Thus, we find in Latin, libeo, libet, or lubeo, lubet, is rendered, to please, to like; lubens, willing, glad, cheerful, pleased; libenter, lubenter, willingly, gladly, readily. What is the primary sense, the visible or physical action, from which the idea of willing is taken? We find, either by knowing the radical sense of willing, ready, in other cases, or by the predominant sense of the elements Lb, as in Lat. labor, to slide, liber, free, &c., that the primary sense is to move, incline or advance toward an object, and hence the sense of willing, ready, prompt. Now this Latin word is the English love, German lieben, liebe. "Lubet me ire," I love to go; I am inclined to go; I go with cheerfulness; but the affinity between love and lubeo has been obscured by a slight difference of application, among the Romans and the Teutonic nations.

Perhaps no person has suspected that the English words heat, hate, and hest in behest, are all radically the same word. But this is the fact. Sax. hætian, to heat, or be hot, and to hate; hætan, to heat and to call; hatan, to call, to order, to command; ge-hætan or ge-hatan, to grow warm, to promise, to vow; Gothic gahaitan, to call, to promise; Dutch heeten, to heat, to name, to call, bid or command; German heitzen, to heat; heissen, to call; hitzen, to heat, to hoist; Swedish hetsa, to inflame, to provoke; Danish heder, to heat, to be called. Behest, we have from the German or Swedish dialect. Heat coincides with the Latin æstus for hæstus, which is written with s, like the German. Hate coincides with the Latin odi, osus, so written for hodi, hosus, and as the Teutonic h often represents the Latin c, as in horn, cornu, the Danish orthography, heder, coincides with the Latin cito, to call. Now what is the radical sense? Most obviously to stir, agitate, rouse, raise, implying a driving or impulse; and hence in Latin æstuo, to be hot, and to rage or storm; hence to excite, and hence the sense of the Latin cito, quickly, from stirring, rousing to action. In this case hatred, as well as heat, is violent excitement. We find also in the Saxon and Gothic the sense of vowing, that is, of driving out the voice, uttering, declaring, a sense allied to calling and commanding, and to this is allied the sense of the Latin recito, to recite.

In English, befal signifies to fall on, to happen to; in German, the same word, befallen, has the like signification. But in Saxon, gefeallan signifies to fall, to rush on; while in German, gefallen signifies to please, that is, to suit, to come to one's mind, to be agreeable. The Danish gefalder has the same signification as the German.

We find by the Saxon, that the English reck, to care, and reckon, and the Latin rego, to rule, are all the same word, varied in orthography and application. To find the primary sense of reck, to care, we are then to examine the various derivative senses. And we need go no further than to the Latin rectus and English right, the sense of which is straight, for this sense is derived from straining, stretching. Care, then, is a straining of the mind, a stretching toward an object, coinciding with the primary sense of attention. The primary sense of reckon is to strain out sounds, to speak, tell, relate; a sense now disused.

The Saxon care, carc, carcian, to care, to cark, is connected in origin with the Latin carcer, a prison; both from the sense of straining, whence holding or restraint.

To prove how the primary general sense of a word may ramify into different senses, by special appropriation of the word among separate families of men proceeding from the same stock, let us observe the different senses in which leap is used by the English, and by the nations on the continent. In English, to leap is simply to spring; as, to leap a yard; to leap over a fence. But on the continent it signifies to run. Now it will be seen that this word, as used by the Germans, can not always be translated by itself, that is, by the same word, into English. Take for illustration the following passage from Luther's Version of the Scriptures: 1 Sam. xvii. 17. "Nimm für deine bruder diese epha sangen, und diese zehen brod, und lauf ins heer zu deinen brüdern;" "Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and leap to the camp of thy brethren." Leap, instead of run, is good German, but bad English.* There are two other words in this passage, of which a like remark may be made. The German brod, loaves, is our bread, which admits of no plural; and sangen is our singed, which we can not apply to parched corn.

So in some of the Teutonic languages, to warp kittens or puppies, to warp eggs, is correct language, though to our ears very odd; but this is only a particular application of the primary sense, to throw. We say to lay eggs, but to lay is to throw down.

By this comparison of the different uses and applications of a word, we are able, in most cases, to detect its original signification. And it is by this means, we apprehend, that we may arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the same word came to have different and even opposite significations.

It is well known, for example, that the Hebrew word ברך borak, is rendered, in our version of the Scriptures, both to bless and to curse. The propriety of the latter rendering is controverted by Parkhurst, who labours to prove, that in Kings and in Job, where it is rendered to curse, it ought to be rendered to bless; and he cites, as authorities, the ancient versions. It is true that in 1 Kings xxi. 10, 13; and in Job i. 11, and ii. 5, the Seventy have rendered the word by ευλογεω, to bless; and other ancient versions agree with the Septuagint. But let the word be rendered by bless in the following passages: "Put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone, and his flesh, and he will bless thee to thy face." "Bless God and die." How very absurd does such a translation appear! It shows the immense importance of understanding the true theory of language, and the primary sense of radical words. Let us then endeavour to discover, if possible, the source of the difficulty in the case here mentioned. To be enabled to arrive at the primary sense, let us examine the word in the several languages, first of the Shemitic, and then of the Japhetic stock.

Heb. ברך, to bless; to salute, or wish a blessing to.

2. To curse; to blaspheme.

3. To couch or bend the knee, to kneel.

Deriv. A blessing, and the knee.

Chaldee, ברך, to bless; to salute at meeting, and to bid farewell at parting.

2. To bend the knee.

3. To dig; to plow; to set slips of a vine or plant for propagation.—Talm. and Rabbin.

Deriv. The knee; a blessing; a cursing; a scion; the young of fowls.

Syriac, ܒܪܟ, to fall on the knees; to fall or bow down; Judg. v. 27.

2. To issue or proceed from; Matt. xv. 19.

3. To bless.

Samaritan, ברך, to bless.

Ethiopic, በረከ, to bless. Deriv. the knee.

Arabic, بَرَكَ baraka, to bend the knee; to fall on the breast, as a camel.

2. To be firm, or fixed.

3. To rain violently, to pour forth rain, as the clouds. Gr. βρεχω.

4. To detract from; to traduce; to reproach or pursue with reproaches; to revile.

5. To bless; to pray for a blessing on; to prosper; to be blessed.

6. To hasten; to rush, as on an enemy; to assail.

Deriv. The breast; the basin of a fountain; a fishpond, or receptacle of water, as in Heb. and Ch.; also increase; abundance; constancy; splendour; a flash of light.

In the latter sense, usually from بَرَقَ, Heb. and Ch. ברק baraka.

The Arabic word supplies us with the certain means of determining the radical sense; for among other significations, it has the sense of pouring forth rain; and this is precisely the Greek βρεχω. The primary sense then is to send, throw, or drive, in a transitive sense; or in an intransitive sense, to rush, to break forth.

To bless and to curse have the same radical sense, which is, to send or pour out words, to drive or to strain out the voice, precisely as in the Latin appello, from pello, whence peal, as of thunder or of a bell. The two senses spring from the appropriation of loud words to express particular acts. This depends on usage, like all other particular applications of one general signification. The sense in Scripture is to utter words either in a good or bad sense; to bless, to salute; or to rail, to scold, to reproach; and this very word is probably the root of reproach, as it certainly is of the Latin precor, used, like the Shemitic word, in both senses, praying and cursing, or deprecating.* It is also the same word as the English pray, It. pregare, L. precor, the same as preach, D. preeken, W. pregethu. To the same family belong the Gr. βραχω, βρυχω, βρυχαομαι, to bray, to roar, to low, Lat. rugio. Here we see that bray is the same word, applied to the voice of the ass and to breaking in a mortar, and both are radically the same word as break.

The sense of kneeling, if radical, is to throw, and if from the noun, the sense of the noun is a throwing, a bending.

The Chaldee sense of digging, if radical, is from thrusting in an instrument, or breaking the ground; but perhaps it is a sense derived from the name of a shoot or scion, and in reality, to set a shoot, to plant.

The Syriac use of this word in Matt. xv. 19, is intransitive, to issue, to shoot, or break forth. So in Arabic, to rush on, to assault. The sense of firmness in Arabic is from setting, throwing down, as in kneeling; and hence the sense of breast, the fixed, firm part.

That this word has the sense both of blessing and of cursing, or reproaching, we have demonstrative evidence in the Welsh language. Rhég, in Welsh, is ברך, without the prefix. It signifies a sending out; utterance; a gift or present; a consigning; a ban, a curse or imprecation. Rhegu, to give; to consign; to curse. From rhég is formed preg, a greeting, or salutation, [the very Hebrew and Chaldee word,] pregeth, a sermon, and pregethu, to preach. Here we have not only the origin of preach, but another important fact, that preg, and of course ברך, is a compound word, composed of a prefix, p or b, and rhég. But this is not all; the Welsh greg, a cackling, gregar, to cackle, is formed with the prefix g on this same rhég. [Dan. krage, a crow.]

In Welsh, bregu signifies to break; brég, a breach, a rupture. This Owen deduces from bar, but no doubt erroneously. It is from rhegu, and there is some reason to think that break is from ברך, rather than from ברק, but probably both are from one radix, with different prefixes.

We observe one prominent sense of the Arabic بَرَكَ baraka, is to rain violently; to pour forth water, as clouds. This is precisely the Greek βρεχω; a word found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages, but written either with or without its prefix.

Saxon, regn or ryn, rain; regnan, to rain.

Dutch, regen, rain; regenen, beregenen, to rain upon.

German, regen, rain; regnen, to rain; beregnen, to rain on.

Swedish, regna, to rain.

Danish, regn, rain; regner, to rain.

Saxon, racu, rain; Cimbric, rækia, id.

Here we find that the English rain, is from the same root as the Welsh rhég, rhegu, and the Shemitic ברך.

Pursuing the inquiry further, we find that the Saxon recan, or reccan, [W. rhegu,] signifies to speak, to tell, to relate, to reckon, the primary sense of which last is to speak or tell; also to rule, which shows this to be the Latin rego; also to care, which is the English reck. That this is the same word as rain, we know from the Danish, in which language regner signifies both to rain and to reckon, to tell, to count or compute. In the German, the words are written a little differently; rechnen, to reckon, and regnen, to rain. So in Dutch, rekenen and regenen; but this is a fact by no means uncommon

Here we find that the English reckon and reck, and the Latin rego, are the same word. The primary sense is to strain, to reach, to stretch. Care, is a stretching of the mind, like attention, from the Latin tendo, and restraint is the radical sense of governing. Hence rectus, right, that is, straight, stretched.

Hence we find that rain and the Latin regnum, reign, are radically the same word.

Now in Saxon racan, or ræcan, is the English reach, to stretch or extend, from the same root, and probably reek,

* "Improbus urget iratis precibus."—Horace.

Saxon recan, reocan, to fume or smoke; for this is to send off.

We might have mentioned before, that the Chaldee בריכה, a scion or branch, is precisely the Celtic word for arm; Irish braic, or raigh; Welsh braiç; whence the Greek βραχιων, the Latin brachium, whence the Spanish brazo, whence the French bras, whence the English brace. The arm is a shoot, a branch, and branch is from this root or one of the family, n being casual; branch for brach.

On this word let it be further observed, or on פרק or ברק, if radically different, are formed, with the prefix s, the German sprechen, to speak, sprache, speech; Dutch spreeken, spraak; Swedish spraka, språk; Danish sprog, speech; and Swedish spricka, to break; Danish sprekker. The same word with n casual is seen in spring, the breaking or opening of the winter; and here we see the origin of the marine phrase, to spring a mast, Danish springer, to burst, crack or spring. This in Swedish is written without n, spricka, to break, burst, split; but a noun of this family has n, springa, a crack, and spring, a spring, a running.

Now let us attend to other Shemitic words consisting of cognate elements.

Chaldee, פרך frak, to rub or scrape; to rub out or tread out, as grain from the ear or sheaf; Latin frico, frio.

2. To collect and bind, as sheaves; perhaps English, to rake.

3. To break or break down.

4. To question; to doubt. In Saxon and Gothic frægnan, fragan, signifies to ask.

Deriv. Froward; perverse; Prov. ii. 12. So in English refractory.

This verb is not in the Hebrew; but there are two derivatives, one signifying the inner vail of the temple; so called probably from its use in breaking, that is, interrupting access, or separation, like diaphragm in English. The other derivative is rendered rigour, or cruelty; that which strains, oppresses, breaks down, or rakes, harasses.

With this verb coincides the Irish bracaim, to break, to harrow, that is, to rake.

Syr. ܦܪܟ, to rub, so rendered, Luke vi. 1. Lat. frico. A derivative signifies to comminute.

Deriv. Distortion; winding; twisting. Let this be noted.

Ar. فَرَكَ fraka, to rub, Lat. frico.

2. To hate, as a husband or wife; to be languid, or relaxed.

Deriv. Laxity; frangibility; friability.

Heb. פרק, to break, burst, or rend; to break off; to separate.

Deriv. A breaking or parting of a road.

Ch. פרק, to break.

2. To redeem, that is to free, separate or deliver.

3. To explain, as a doubtful question.

Deriv. One who ransoms or delivers; a rupture; the neck or its juncture; a joint of the fingers, &c.; the ankle; the joint of a reed; a chapter or section of a book; explanation; exposition. פירוק, a rupture, coinciding with the English broke.

Syr. ܦܪܩ, to redeem.

2. To depart; to remove; to separate.

Deriv. A recess, or withdrawing; separation; liberation; redemption; safety; vertebra.

Sam. The same as the Syriac verb.

Ar. فَرَقَ faraka, to separate; to divide; to withdraw; to disperse; [qu. Lat. spargo,] to lay open; to disclose; to cast out; to immerse.

Deriv. Separation; distinction; distance; interval; dispersion; aurora, as we say, the break of day; also, a garment reaching to the middle of the thigh, qu. frock; also breech.

We have placed these two words together, because we are convinced they are both of one family, or formed on the same radical word. The latter coincides exactly with the Latin frango, fregi, fractum, for n in frango is undoubtedly casual. Now in Welsh bregu, to break, would seem to be directly connected with ברך, yet doubtless bregu is the English break, the German brechen, the Dutch breeken, &c. In truth, the three words פרך, ברך and פרק, are probably all from one primitive root formed with different prefixes, or rather with the same prefix differently written; the different words bearing appropriate senses, among different tribes of men.

We observe in the Chaldee word the sense of questioning. Perhaps this may be the Gothic fragan, to ask, and if so, it coincides with the Latin rogo, the latter without the prefix. In the sense of break, we find, in the Greek, ῥηγνυω, without a prefix.

Most of the significations of these verbs are too obvious to need illustration. But we find in the Syriac the sense of distortion, a sense which at first appears to be remote from that of breaking or bursting asunder. But this is probably the primary sense, to strain, to stretch, a sense we retain in the phrase, to break upon the wheel; and by dropping the prefix, we have the precise word in the verb, to rack.

Now if this is the genuine sense, we find it gives the English wreck and wrack, the Danish vrag, Sw. vrak, a wreck. In Saxon, wræcan, wrecan, is the English wreak, that is, to drive, or throw on; wræc, is an exile, a wretch. In Dan. vrager signifies to reject; Sw. vråka, to throw away; all implying a driving force, and that wreck is connected with break, is probable for another reason, that the Latin fractus, frango, forms a constituent part of naufragium, the English shipwreck, which in Danish is simply vrag.

Now if straining, distortion, is one of the senses of this root, the English wring, wrong, Danish vrang, Sw. vrång, may be deduced from it, for undoubtedly n is not radical in these words. The Dutch has wringen, but the German drops the first letter and has ringen, both to twist or wind, and to ring or sound; the latter sense from straining or throwing, as in other cases. Without n, wring would be wrig, and wrong, wrog; wrang, wrag, Dan. vrag.

In Greek, ῥηγος is a blanket or coverlet, and connected with ῥηγνυμι; that is, a spread, from stretching, or throwing over.

We find also among the Chaldee derivatives the sense of a neck, and a joint. Now we find this word in Irish, braigh, the neck; in Greek, without the prefix, ῥαχις, the spine of the back; Saxon, hracca; English, the rack, and, from the Greek, the rickets, from distortion.

Coinciding with the Greek ῥηγνυω, to break, we find in Welsh rhwgaw, to rend; and coinciding with ῥαχια, a rock, a crag, Welsh craig, and connected with these, the Saxon hracod, English ragged, that is, broken; evidently the participle of a verb of this family.

Hence we find the senses of distortion and breaking connected in this root, in a great variety of instances.

The Shemitic ברק, to lighten, to shine or flash, is one of this family. The sense is, to shoot or dart, to throw, as in all like cases. And under this root, the Arabic has the sense, to adorn, as a female; to make bright or shining; which gives the English prank and prink, D. pragt, G. pracht. Prance is of the same family, from leaping, starting, darting up.

In Greek βραχυς, short, stands in the Lexicons as a primary word or root. But this is from the root of break, which is lost in Greek, unless in ῥηγνυμι, without the prefix. From βραχυς, or the root of this word, the French language has abreger, to abridge; and what is less obvious, but equally certain, is, that from the same root the Latin has brevis, by sinking the palatal letter, as we do in bow, from bugan, and in lay, from lecgan; so that abridge and abbreviate, brief, are from one root.

It should have been before mentioned that the Latin refragor signifies to resist, to strive against, to deny, whence refractory; a sense that demonstrates the primary sense to be, to strain, urge, press; and refraction, in optics, is a breaking of the direct course of rays of light by turning them; a sense coinciding with that of distortion.

We see then that one predominant sense of break, is, to strain, to distort. Let us now examine some of the biliteral roots in rg and rk, which, if b is a prefix, must be the primary elements of all the words above mentioned.

Ch. רגג rag, ragag, to desire, to long for. This is the Greek ὀρεγω, and English to reach; for desire is expressed by reaching forward, stretching the mind toward the object. So in Latin appeto and expeto, from peto, to move toward. This coincides nearly with the Latin rogo, to ask, and the Goth. fragnan, Sax. fragnan.

Syr. ܪܓ, to desire; and with olaph prefixed, ܐܪܓ to desire, or long; also to wet, or moisten; also ܪܘܐ, to moisten —Latin rigo, irrigo, to irrigate.

Deriv. Tender, soft, fresh, from moisture or greenness. Qu. Lat. recens, a derivative.

Here desire and irrigation are both from one root; desire is a reaching forward, and irrigation is a spreading of water.

This root, in Hebrew ארג, signifies to weave, or connect as in texture and net-work; but the primary sense is to stretch or strain.

In Arabic, the same verb أرج signifies to emit an agreeable smell; to breathe fragrance; radically, to throw or send out; to eject; a mere modification of the same sense. This is the Latin fragro, whence fragrant, with a prefix; but according exactly with the English reek.

ארך in Ch. Heb. Syr. and Sam., signifies to prolong, to extend. In Ar. as in Heb. in Hiph. to delay, or retard; that is, to draw out in time.

רגע in Heb. has been differently interpreted; indeed, it has been rendered by words of directly contrary signification. The more modern interpreters, says Castle, render it, to split, divide, separate, or break; the ancient interpreters rendered it, to stiffen, to make rigid or rough, to wrinkle or corrugate. Castle and Parkhurst, however, agree in rendering it, in some passages, to quiet, still, allay; Jer. xlvii. 6; l. 34. In Job vii. 5, our translators have rendered it broken, "My skin is broken," [rough, or rigid.] In Job xxvi. 12, it is rendered by divide, "He divideth the sea by his power." In Vanderhooght's Bible it is in this place rendered by commovet, he agitates the sea. The Seventy render it by κατεπαυσε, he stilled; and this is the sense which Parkhurst gives it.

In Isaiah li. 15, and Jer. xxxi. 35, it is rendered in our version by divide. "But I am the Lord thy God, that divided the sea, whose waves roared."

In Vanderhooght's Bible it is rendered in Isaiah li. 15, "I am Jehovah thy God, qui commovens mare, ut perstrepant fluctus ejus." In Jer. xxxi. 35, "commovens mare, ut tumultuentur fluctus"—agitating or moving the sea, that the waves roar, or may roar. The passage in Isaiah is rendered by the Seventy, οτι ο Θεος σου, ο ταρασσων την θαλασσαν, και ηχων τα κυματα αυτης, "agitating the sea, and causing its waves to roar and resound." In the French translation, the passage in Isaiah is, "qui fend la mer, et ses flots bruient:" [1] who divide the sea, and the waves roar. In Jeremiah the passage is, "qui agite la mer, et les flots en bruient:" who agitates the sea, and therefore the waves roar. In Italian, the passage in Isaiah is rendered, "che muovo il mare, e le sue onde romoreggiano." In Jeremiah, "che commuove il mare, onde le sue onde romoreggiano:" who moveth the sea, wherefore its waves roar, or become tumultuous.

These different renderings show the importance of understanding the literal or primary sense of words; for whatever may be the real sense in the passages above mentioned, it cannot be to divide. If we are to give to vau in the following word, its usual sense of and, it is difficult to make sense of the word רגע, by translating it, he stilleth: He stilleth the sea and its waves are tumultuous, or He stilleth the sea that the waves may roar or be agitated! This will not answer. The more rational version would be, He roughens the sea, and its waters roar; or he drives, impels it into agitation. In Ethiopic, the same word signifies to coagulate, to freeze, to become rigid; and this is undoubtedly the Latin rigeo, and with a prefix frigeo, and this signification is perhaps allied to the Lat. rugo, to wrinkle; for as a general rule, the radical sense of wrinkle is to draw, as in contract, contraho, and this seems to be the sense of rigeo. Both these words are allied to rough, which is from breaking or wrinkling. This sense would perhaps well suit the context in these two passages, as it would also that in Job vii. 5: My skin is rough.

Now in Arabic, the general signification of רגע is to return, to repeat, to withdraw, which may be from drawing back; a different application of the original sense, to strain, stretch, or extend.

The root ריק in Chaldee signifies to spit, and this is probably the Latin ructo, somewhat varied in application. The same verb in Arabic راق, rauka, signifies to drive off, to eject; to shoot or grow long, as teeth; to strain, purify, or make clear, as wine; precisely the English to rack; also to spread and to pour out. Hebrew ריק, to empty, to draw out, to attenuate or make thin; and as a noun, spittle; Syriac, to spit, to draw out, to attenuate; Samaritan, to pour out, to draw out, to extend; Ethiopic, to be fine, slender, or thin; Arabic, to be soft, tender, thin. The verb רך has a like signification, and is perhaps from the same original root; רקע, Hebrew, to spread, stretch, extend. But, says Castle, all the ancient interpreters rendered the word, to ordain, establish, make firm; to strike, to beat, as plates of metal. But the sense is to stretch, to spread, and the beating is only the means of extending. Hence רקיע, the firmament, which agrees well with Lat. regio, an extent; in Hebrew, properly, an expanse. And to reconcile the ancient and modern interpretations of this word, let it be remembered that strength and firmness are usually or always from stretching, tension.

Now let us hear Ainsworth on the word regio. "Regio a rego quod priusquam provinciæ fierent, regiones sub regibus erant atque ab his regebantur." How much more natural is it to deduce regio from the primary sense of rego, which is to stretch, to strain, to extend! Regio is an extent, a word of indefinite signification.

In Chaldee and Arabic this verb signifies to mend, to repair, to make whole, from extending, spreading over, or making strong. See the root כל, infra.

We observe that רגע and רקע agree, in original signification, with the English reach, on the root of which, or some of its derivatives, was formed stretch. That ברך, פרך, and פרק were formed on any of the foregoing biliteral roots, we may not be able to affirm; but it is certain from the Welsh, that the first consonant of the triliteral root is a prefix, and it is certain, from the Shemitic languages, that the primary sense is the same in the biliteral and triliteral roots, or that all the applications or particular significations may readily be deduced from one general signification.

To illustrate this subject more fully, let us attend to the various applications of some other Shemitic words of extensive use.

ברא.

Heb. ברא bara, to create. This, by most lexicographers, is given as the first signification in all the Shemitic languages. Parkhurst says, to create; to produce into being; Gen. i. 1.

2. To form by accretion or concretion of matter; Gen. i. 21.

3. In Hiph. to make fat; to fatten or batten; 1 Sam. ii. 29.

4. To do or perform something wonderful; Num. xvi. 30.

5. In Niph. to be renewed. In Kal. to renew, in a spiritual sense; Ps. li. 12.

Castle says,

1. To create from nothing, or to produce something new or excellent from another thing; Gen. i; Is. xliii. 5.

2. In Niph. to be renewed or re-created; Is. xlviii. 7; Ps. cii. 19.

3. To cut off; to take away; to bear away, or remove; also to select; to prepare; Josh. xvii. 15, 18; Ezek. xxiii. 47.

Gesenius says,

1. Strictly, to hew, to hew out. [Ar. to cut, to cut out, to plane.]

2. To form; to make; to produce. Ar. برا. The order of significations is, as in the Ar. خلق galaka, to be smooth, to make smooth. 2. To plane. 3. To form, make; Gen. i. 1, 21, 27.

1. Niph. passive of Kal. No. 2; Gen. ii. 4.

2. To be born; Ezek. xxi. 30; Ps. cii. 18.

Pi. ברא, the verb differently pointed; to hew, to cut down; Josh. xvii. 15, 18.

2. To cut down with the sword; to kill; Ezek. xxiii. 47.

3. To make fat; 1 Sam. ii. 29.

Thus far the Hebrew.

Chal. ברא, to create; Gen. i. 1.

2. To cut off; Is. xl. 20.

3. To make fat; to grow sound or strong. Talm.

Deriv. Fat; whole; sound; strong. Castle.

Syr. ܒܪܐ, to create; Gen. i. 1; Mark xiii. 19.

2. To remove to a distance; and Deriv. distance, distant. Castle.

Sam. ࠁࠓࠀ, to create; Gen. i. 22; Deut. iv. 32. Castle.

Ar. بَرَأَ, to create; Job xxxviii. 7. [qu. 4 and 6.]

2. To be free, or guiltless, not obnoxious to punishment; Num. v. 28, 31; and xxxii. 22; Rom. vii. 6.

3. To free; to absolve from a crime; to liberate; to dismiss; to justify; Ex. xx. 7; Num. xiv. 18.

4. To escape; to forsake.

5. To recover from disease; to be healed; to restore to health; Lev. xiii. 18; Josh. v. 8; Matt. iv. 23.

6. To cleanse; to free from impurities.

7. To abstain from.

Deriv. Creator; free; unobnoxious; clean; empty.

Ar. بَرَى, to create.

2. To cut off; to hew or pare.

3. To separate; to distinguish.

4. To make thin.

5. To oppose; to strive; to resist.

6. To provoke; to boast, or make a parade.

7. To distribute; to disperse. Castle.

According to Gesenius, the primary sense of the verb is to hew, to cut out, and thus to make smooth, and thus to create; and he deduces these senses in the same order as he does those of the Arabic verb, which gives the word like. But there is no ground for this opinion; and doubtless the verb originated before the use of edge tools.

The predominant senses of this word are, to separate, to free, to remove; as we see by the Arabic and Syriac.

Now hewing is indeed separating, and we have the English word pare from this root; but we must seek for a signification which is more general than that of paring, or we shall not be able to account for the sense of making fat, sound, entire, and strong, nor for that of being born.

The truth undoubtedly is, this word is of the same family with the English bear, the Latin pario, and the radical sense is to throw, to thrust, to send, to drive, to extend; hence to throw out, to produce, as applied to the birth of children or of the world. To throw or drive, is the primary sense of separation and division, that is, to drive off. The English word deal, when traced to its root, presents the same fact. See Deal. To create, is to produce or bring forth, the same sense as that of birth, applied to a different object. The sense of hewing and paring is from driving off, separation. In Syriac, we observe the general application, in removal, or departure to a distance. The sense of fattening is derivative, and allied to that of healing or making whole, sound, strong, in the Arabic; that is, preparing, bringing to a good state, or from tension, the usual primary sense of strength and power.

To obtain a more full and satisfactory view of this subject, let us attend to the same word in the modern languages of Europe.

LATIN.

Paro, to prepare, make ready, procure, design, &c. The radical sense of paro is probably the same as in the Shemitic languages; to produce, to bring forward. So also ready implies an advancing, and so does promptness. But the various ways of preparing a thing for use naturally give to the word, in process of time, a variety of particular significations; each of which results in bringing the thing to the state desired. The compounds of paro, are apparo, to prepare, to furnish, accoutre, or set out; comparo, to prepare or procure, to make equal, to compare, to join, to dress or make ready; præparo, to prepare; reparo, to repair, to create anew, to regain, to compensate; separo, to separate. Let the Latin uses of this word be compared with the same Hebrew word in Joshua xvii. 15, where it is rendered cut down. "Ascend to the wood country and cut down for thyself;" Septuagint, εκκαθαρον σεαυτῳ, clear for thyself. This is one mode of preparation for use. In Ezek. xxi. 19, it is rendered choose; Septuagint, διαταξεις, appoint.

ITALIAN.

Parare, to prepare; to garnish; to adorn; to propose an occasion; to parry, or ward off, as a blow; to defend; to cover from or shelter; to repair; to teach a horse to stop, and in horsemanship, to stop; parata, a warding off, a garnishing; parato, prepared, ready, prompt, warded off or parried, shielded, defended.

Apparare, to learn; apparato, learned, prepared; apparato, preparation, garnishment.

Parecchio, a preparation; also equal, even [L. par;] parecchiare, to prepare; pareggiare, to make equal, to compare; apparecchiare, to prepare, to ornament or garnish, to set in order; appareggiare, to put in competition, to match, to equal.

Comparare, to compare.

Disparare, to forget; disparare, sparare, to unfurnish, disgarnish, to make unready, to disbowel, to separate, disjoin, unpair; to discharge, as artillery.

Imparare, to learn.

Riparare, to repair, to restore to the first state; to repair, or resort to, or have access to; to parry, or ward off; riparo, reparation, a fort, a bank, fence, mound, remedy, shelter.

SPANISH.

Parar, to prepare; to stop, detain, prevent; to end; to treat or use ill; to stake at cards; to point out the game, as pointers.

Parada, a halt or stopping, end, pause; a fold for cattle; a relay, as of horses; a dam or bank; a stake or bet; a parade, or a place where troops are assembled to exercise; parado, remiss, careless, unemployed.

Par, a pair; a peer; after-birth; the handle of a bell.

Aparar, to stretch out the hands or skirts of a garment for receiving any thing; to dig and heap earth round plants; to close the upper and hind quarter of a shoe to the sole; to couple male and female animals; to dub as a ship.

Aparador, a sideboard, a dresser in a kitchen, a workshop, a wardrobe: aparato, preparation, pomp, show.

Aparear, to match; to suit one thing to another [pair].

Aparejo, preparation, harness, sizing of a piece of linen or board on which something is to be painted, tackle, rigging employed on board of a ship. [Apparel, parrel.]

Comparar, to compare.

Disparejar, to make unequal.

Disparar, to discharge, as fire-arms.

Amparar, to shelter; to protect. [Aragon, to sequester, as goods.]

Emparedar, to confine or shut up.

Reparar, to repair; to observe carefully, to consider; to mend or correct; to suspend or detain; to guard, defend, protect; to regain strength, or recover from sickness; to right the helm.

Separar, to separate.

PORTUGUESE.

Parar, v. i. to stop, to cease to go forward; to confine upon, to meet at the end, to touch, to be bounded; to tend, to drive at something, to aim at, to come to; to imply, involve, or comprise: "Naõ posso parar com fome," I cannot bear hunger. "Ninguem pode aqui parar," Nobody can live or stay here. [Eng. bear.]

Parar, v. t. to stop, to hinder from proceeding; to parry or ward off; to turn or change with regard to inclination or morals; to lay or stake as a wager. Parada, a stopping or place of stopping; a bet or wager.

Amparar, to protect, shelter, defend, abet.

Comparar, to compare; comprar, to buy, to procure.

Aparar, to pare, as an apple; to mend or make a pen; to parry a blow.

Aparelhar, to prepare, to fit, to cut out or rough hew; aparelho, tackle in a ship for hoisting things, [Eng. a parrel.]

Disparar, to shoot, to discharge, as fire-arms.

Reparar, to repair; to parry in fencing; to advert; to observe; to make amends; to retrieve; to recover; to recruit; to shelter; reparo, in fortification, defence.

FRENCH.

Parer, to deck, adorn, trim, set off, embellish; to parry or ward off. "Parer des cuirs," to dress leather; "Parer le pied d'un cheval," to pare a horse's hoof.

Parer, v. i. to stop; paresse, idleness.

Pari, a lay, bet, or wager; parier, to bet or lay a wager.

Appareil, preparation, furniture, train, retinue, [Eng. apparel]. Apparaux, tackle, sails, and rigging, [Eng. parrel].

Pair, a peer, an equal; paire, a pair; apparier, to pair, to match.

S'emparer, to seize, to invade.

Reparer, to repair.

Separer, to separate.

ARMORIC.

Para, to dress, to trim, to stop, to parry, to prepare.

RUSSIAN.

Uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to mow or reap, to cut, to dress, as the hair. This word has the common prefix u.

PERSIC.

پریدن poridan, to cut off.

WELSH.

Par, something contiguous, or that is in continuity; a state of readiness or preparedness; a pair or couple; a fellow, match.

Pâr, a cause; the essence, germ, or seed of a thing; a spear.

Para, to continue, to endure, to persevere.

Pârad, a causing; parai, that causes to be.

Parawd, prepared, ready; parodi, to prepare.

That all the foregoing words in the present European languages, [and several others might have been added,] are formed from one stock or radix, coinciding with the Latin paro, is a fact that admits of no question. The only doubt respecting the correctness of the whole preceding statement, is, whether the Latin paro is radically the same as the Oriental ברא; and with regard to this point, we should suppose the evidence to be convincing. Indeed, there is good reason to believe that the Oriental verbs ברא, ברר, חבר, and עבר, are all formed from one primitive radix. Certain it is that the English bear comprehends both the Latin fero and pario, and the latter corresponds nearly with פרה and Eth. ፈረየ fari, to bear.

But admitting only what is certain, that all the foregoing European words are from one radix, we are then to seek for a primary meaning from which may be deduced the following significations; Lat. to prepare; Ital. to adorn, to parry, to stop, to defend, to repair, to learn; Span. to prepare, to stop, to lay or stake as a wager, a pair or couple; Port. to stop, to confine upon or be contiguous, to drive or aim at, to parry, to pare; Fr. to deck, to parry, to stop, to pare; Arm. to dress, to prepare, to parry; Russ. to adjust, to dress, to mow or reap; Welsh, preparedness, contiguity, a pair, a cause, to continue or endure; and several other significations.

The various significations result from throwing, sending, driving. To separate or remove, is to drive or force apart; hence to parry, and hence to defend. Separation implies extension, a drawing out in length or time; hence the Portuguese senses of confining upon, reaching to the limit. This gives the sense of par, equal, that is, of the same extent, and hence coming to, and suiting, as in Latin convenio.

Here let it be observed, that admitting the word par, equal, to belong to this family, as in the Welsh, we have strong reason to believe that the Shemitic חבר, to join, or fit together, to associate, whence as a noun, an associate, is formed from the same root, or ברא; for in the Saxon we find not only fera, but gefera, a companion, fellow, or peer; gefera, answering precisely to the Oriental word.

The sense of betting is from throwing down, as we say, to lay a wager. The sense of stopping is from setting, fixing, or from parrying. The sense of adorning is from putting on, which is from sending, or from extension, enlargement, as we say, to set off, and hence it is allied to the sense of show, display, parade. Preparation is from producing, bringing forward, or adjusting, making right; and often implies advancing, like ready, prompt, and the latter word, prompt, from promo, to bring forth, affords a good illustration of the words derived from paro.

The senses of cutting off, paring, and the like, require no explanation.

The Italian disparare, and the Spanish and Portuguese disparar, to discharge fire-arms, present the original sense of the root, to send or drive. This sense gives that of the Welsh pâr, a spear, as well as a cause, or that which impels. A spear is a shoot, from the sense of thrusting; and our word spear is probably formed from the root of bar, and Welsh ber, a spit, a pike, a lance, a spear, Lat. veru. Now in Chaldee, a bar is עברא, from עבר, to pass, a verb which is probably of the same family with ברא. It is further to be observed that in Italian, bar is written both barra and sbarra.

It is observed above that ברא is the English bear and the Latin pario; but pario would seem to be the Hebrew פרה parah, to be fruitful, to bear fruit, applied to plants and animals. But this word seems to denote producing in general, rather than the production of children. However this may be, it is certain that bear in English, as well as in Saxon, expresses the sense of both pario and fero in Latin. The Latin fero, and the Greek φερω, signify both to carry and to produce, as young or fruit. Pario, does not. So in the Gothic, bairan is to carry, gabairan is to carry and to produce young. In German, führen is to carry, and gebären, to bring forth, to bear a child. In Dutch, beuren is to lift; voeren, to carry; and baaren, to bring forth, as children, to bear, to beget, to cause. Danish, bærer, to carry, to support, and to yield or produce. Sw. bära, to carry; barn, a son. Irish beirim, to bear or bring forth, and to tell or relate, like the Latin fero, whence Fr. parler, to speak.

It appears then that the English bear, and the Saxon from which we have received it, and the Gothic and the Danish corresponding words unite, in the same orthography, the senses of two words of different orthography in other languages. We have found other examples of a similar kind. There is, therefore, solid ground to believe that all these words are from one primitive root; the different modes of writing the word, and the several appropriations, having originated in different families of the great races of men, before languages were reduced to writing; and when they came to be written, each word was written according to its usual pronunciation, and defined according to its use in each family. And by the intermixture of tribes, two or three derivatives of the same stock might have become a part of the same national language. Unquestionably the Greek φερω, and φορεω, are branches of the same stock.

We have, in the modern languages, decisive evidence that different verbs may have, and in fact have a common radix. Thus in English list and lust are different modes of writing the same word; both are united in the other Teutonic dialects. So in Latin libet and lubet; and similar instances we have found in almost every language which we have examined.

The Latin pareo, to appear, to come to light, if not a compound word, may be of this family. Paries, a wall, if primarily a partition wall, is of the same stock. Per belongs to this family, as its signification is passing. The Sax. faran, to fare, Gr. πορευομαι, seems to be from one branch of this stock, probably עבר. See the word PASS in the Dictionary, in the derivative senses of which there are some resemblances to those of ברא.

This verb, says Lowth, means to cover, to cover sin, and so to expiate; and it is never used in the sense of breaking or dissolving a covenant, though that notion occurs so often in the Scriptures; nor can it be forced into this sense, but by a great deal of far-fetched reasoning. See Isaiah xxviii. 18. Lowth on Isaiah, Prelim. Diss.

כפר, says Castle, "texuit, operuit, Anglice, to cover; per metathesin, κρυπτω, κρυφη, peculiariter bitumine, sive glutinosa aliqua materia obduxit; picavit;" Gen. vi. 14.

Parkhurst gives to this verb the sense of covering or overspreading, as primary; and deduces from it the Greek κρυπτω, and English cover and coffer. He, however, admits that in Isaiah xxviii. 18, it signifies to annul, as a covenant. He also considers the sense of atonement or expiation to be radically that of covering.

Gesenius agrees with the English lexicographers, in assigning to this verb the primary sense of covering or overlaying, as in Gen. vi. 14. He admits that this word has the sense, in Isaiah xxviii. 18, of blotting out, obliterating. But he gives to it the sense of forgiving, in some passages, in which our version has that of purging away; Ps. lxv. 3; and lxxix. 9. In these passages, Castle renders the word, to be merciful or propitious.

In all these authors there is, we conceive, a radical mistake, in supposing the primary sense to be to cover, and in the opinion that this Hebrew word is the English verb to cover. A still greater mistake is in the supposition of Castle and Parkhurst, that this, by a metathesis, gives the Greek κρυπτω.

The English word cover comes to us through the French couvrir, from the Italian coprire, a contraction of the Latin co-operio, whence co-opertus, Italian coperto, covered, Eng. *covert. The Latin aperio, is to open, and operio, is to cover, both from pario, or one of the roots in Br, which has just been explained. The root in these words is per or par, and the sense is varied by prefixes; perhaps ad-pario or ab-pario and ob-pario. Now cover can have no connection with כפר, unless this latter word is a compound, with כ for a prefix. This may be the fact, but the connection, even in that case, is very remote.

Let us see if we can gain any light upon the subject of the primary sense of כפר from the cognate languages.

Chaldee, כפר, to deny, to reject; Prov. xxx. 9.

2. To wipe; "She eateth and wipeth her mouth;" Prov. xxx. 20.

3. To wash or cleanse; Matt. xxvii. 24. Castle.

Syriac, ܟܦܪ kafar, to deny; Gen. xviii. 15; Luke xii. 9.

2. To wipe, to wipe away, to annul, to abolish; Prov. xxx. 20; Is. xxviii. 18. Castle.

Arabic, كَفَرَ kafara, to deny; to disbelieve; to be an infidel; to be impious; to blaspheme; Acts iii. 13, 14; 2 Pet. ii. 1, 5; Jude 15.

2. To cover; to conceal.

3. To expiate; to make expiation for one, and free him from crime. Castle.

Now the senses of the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, to deny, to reject, to annul, to wipe, wash, or to cleanse by these acts, cannot be deduced from covering.

In Hebrew, the word has the sense of covering, as the ark, with bitumen or pitch, in Gen. vi. 14; that is, to smear, or pay over, as our seamen now express it. But it should be considered that the sense of covering is rarely or never primary; it is usually from the sense of putting on, which is from the sense of throwing or pressing, or it is from overspreading, which is a spreading, stretching, or throwing over; hence the derivative senses of covering and hiding. These latter senses are sometimes derived from others; but these are the most general. And in this passage of Genesis, the literal sense is probably to put on, or to rub or spread over, a sense which coincides with that of the Chaldee and Syriac, Prov. xxx. 20, though differently applied; or what is more probable, the verb, in Gen. vi. 14, is from the noun, which is the name of the substance used, as we should say, to pitch with pitch.

The real original sense of this Shemitic verb is to remove, to separate, by thrusting away or driving off. Hence its application, in the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic, to denial, the rejection of God or truth. To deny or reject, is to thrust away. Hence from the Arabic caffer, an infidel, one who denies and rejects the Mohammedan religion; hence Caffraria, the southern part of Africa, the country of infidels; so called by the followers of Mohammed, just as the Christians gave the name of pagans to the inhabitants of villages [pagus,] who rejected the Christian religion.

This signification explains the Hebrew uses of this word. Its literal sense is applied to the cleansing or purification of sacred things, as the altar; Lev. xvi. 18. In a spiritual sense, to the purification of the soul, a type of the purification by the blood of Christ; hence it is rendered atonement, or expiation. Hence, probably, the sense of appeasing, Gen. xxxii. 21; Prov. xvi. 14, though this may be from removing or smoothing.

The sense of forgiveness is from thrusting away or giving back, precisely as in the modern languages; Lat. remitto, to send back or away; forgive, to give back or away; pardon, in French, Spanish, and Italian, has a like sense, which is more clearly exhibited by the Dutch vergeeven, German vergeben; ver being the English far, to give far, to give away; hence to reject, and remember no more. The sense of give and of the French donner, is nearly the same as that of כפר. To give, is to send, to cause to pass; and so of donner.

Now it is a question of some moment, whether the opinion that כפר is the same as the English cover, has not inclined lexicographers and commentators to render it by this word, in several passages, where the true sense is to forgive, or to purify by cleansing from sin.

However this may be, the interpretation given above will fully disprove Lowth's assertion, that this word is never used in the sense of breaking or annulling a covenant. So confident is the learned Bishop on this point, that he ventures to call in question the reading, Isaiah xxviii. 18; and to suppose the true word to be תפר, from פור, to break. With respect to the reading we shall offer no opinion; but if the present reading is correct, we are confident that no word in the Hebrew language is better fitted to express the sense. Your covenant with death shall be wiped away, abolished, or as in the version, annulled. And so is the rendering in the Syriac.

If כפר is a compound word and the first letter a prefix, it may be from the same root as the Arabic غَفَرَ gafara, whose signification is to cover. But the primary sense is, to throw or put on. It signifies also, to forgive; but to forgive is to send back or away, remitto, and not to cover. And we apprehend that for want of knowing the primary sense of such verbs, the word cover has been often substituted for forgive, in the translating of this verb.

כל kal or kol.

No. 1. Heb. כל. כול. to hold, to contain; Sw. halla. כלכל. to hold, to sustain, to maintain, to comprehend.

Ch. כול, to measure, that is, to ascertain the contents, or to stretch, and comprehend the whole.

Pah. To feed, to nourish. See אכל.

Deriv. A measure; also custom, rite, manner, probably from holding or continued practice.

Syr. In Aph. to measure. Deriv. A measure.

Eth. ከወለ, to follow; to go behind; Gr. ακολουθεω; that is, to hold to, or to press after.

* In this deduction of cover from the Latin, we are supported by Lunier, the ablest French etymologist whose works we have seen.

Deriv. The hinder part; the poop of a ship; behind. French cul.

No. 2. Heb. כלל, to finish; to complete; to make perfect. Gr. καλος.

כל, all; the whole; Gr. ὁλος, Eng. all, by the loss of the first letter; but in Welsh holl, or oll; and in Saxon al, æl, and geall.

Ch. כלל, to crown; to adorn.

Pih. To perfect; to complete; to comprehend; to embrace.

Deriv. Comprehending; universality; a general rule, &c.

Syr. ܟܠܠ, to crown. Deriv. A crown; all; every one.

Sam. ࠊࠋࠋ, as the Chaldee.

Eth. ከለለ, the same; also, to cover.

Ar. كَلَّ kalla, to be weary or dull; to be languid; to tire; also, to crown; to shine. Deriv. All; dullness; heaviness.

No 3. Heb. כלא, to hold; to restrain; to shut or confine; to check; Gr. κωλυω; Sw. hålla.

Deriv. A place of confinement; Lat. caula.

Ch. כלא, כלה, כלי, to hold; to restrain; also, to trust; to confide in, or rely on; to hope. (See No. 6.) Also, to finish; to perfect; also, to consume; to cause to fail.

In Aph. To call; to cry out; to thunder; Gr. καλεω; Lat. calo; W. galw; Eng. to call; Lat. gallus, from crowing.

Syr. ܟܠܐ, to hold; to restrain; to forbid; to deny.

Deriv. all; a cork, bar or bolt.

Sam. ࠊࠋࠀ, to hold, or restrain.

Eth. ከልአ, to hold, restrain, or prohibit.

Deriv. Lat. alius; a fellow, or companion.

Ar. كلا kala, to keep; to preserve; to turn the face toward a thing and look repeatedly. So in English, to behold. Also, to come to the end, as of life; also, to feed, to devour food; also, to abound in pasture; also, to hinder, or detain; also, to look attentively; also, to sprout; also, to take upon a pledge, or upon trust; supra, Chaldee. (See No. 6.)

No. 4. Heb. כלה, to finish; to consume; to bring to naught; to waste; to fail. (See No. 8.)

No. 5. Ch. אכל, to eat; to consume; also, to take; to hold; to contain. In Aph. to feed; to give food; also, to call; to thunder; to roar, or bellow; also, to publish; to accuse; to defame.

Heb. to eat; to consume.

Sam. ࠀࠊࠋ, to eat.

Syr. ܐܟܠ, to publish; to divulge, as a crime; to accuse.

Æth. አከለ, to suffice, as we say, it is well, Lat. valeo; also, to be or exist; that is, to be held, or to be fixed or permanent, to continue.

Ar. to eat; to devour; to corrode; Lat. helluor.

No. 6. Ar. وَكَلَ wakala, to trust; to commit to another in confidence. (See No. 3.)

Eth. ወከለ wakal, with a prefix; to trust, as above.

No. 7. Heb. יכל, to be able; to prevail; Lat. calleo; W. gallu; Eng. could.

No. 8. Ch. עכל, to digest; to consume. (No. 5.)

Ar. عَكَلَ, to collect; to tie; to bind; to unite; also, to divide, impel, or compel. This is the primary sense of the word, or rather of this root; to press; to strain; to urge, or impel; also, to extend. These verbs are different modifications of one radix; and hence the English hold, call, hollow, heal, hale; the Latin calo, caulis, calleo, callus; Greek κολλα, καλος or καλλος; and a multitude of words in all the modern languages of Europe.

The sense of holding, restraining, forbidding, hindering, and keeping, are too obvious to need any explanation. They are from straining. To this sense is nearly allied the sense of measuring, or ascertaining what is held or contained. That which is contained is all, the whole that is comprehended, from the sense of extension.

The signification of finishing or perfecting, seems, in a good sense, to be from that of soundness; a sense which is from stretching or strength. Or it may be from coming to the end, like finish and achieve, or from shutting, closing. And the sense of consuming, wasting, failing, may be from bringing to an end. In Latin, to consume is to take all; and possibly this may be the sense of this verb. But the Arabic sense of failure would seem rather to be from holding, stopping, or coming to an end.

The sense of eating may be from consuming, or taking apart, but from some of the derivatives of No. 5, we are inclined to think the primary sense is to feed, to crowd, to stuff; the primary sense of the root applied to this particular act; for under the Chaldee root we find words which signify the nut of a species of oak, the Gr. αχυλος, and a collection or crowd of people, [Gr. οχλος,] both of which are from collecting or pressing together.

The sense of seeing and looking is from reaching or casting and striking, or from holding or fixing the eyes on.

The sense of trusting seems also to be that of holding to or resting on. The English hold in behold is from this root.

The sense of calling, roaring, and thunder, is from impelling the voice or sound; a pressing, driving, or straining, applied to sound; like the Latin appello, from pello. Hence the sense of publishing, accusing, and defaming.

The sense of sprouting, in the Arabic, is a shooting or pushing out, as in other cases; Lat. caulis.

The sense of ability, power, strength, in No. 7, is from straining, stretching, or holding, as in other words of the like sense. Hence Lat. calleo, to be skilled, and to be hard, callus.

On this root כל is probably formed סכל, a word differently pointed in the Hebrew and Chaldee. This word signifies in Hebrew, to pervert, to err, to be foolish or infatuated, to act foolishly.

In Chaldee, to understand, know or consider; to look or behold; to cause to understand; Rabbinic, to be ignorant; whence its derivatives, knowledge, wisdom, ignorance. These different significations may result from the different effects of the prefix on the original verb.

In Syr. ܣܟܠ (the same word) signifies to be foolish, or mad; to cause to know, or to give understanding; to observe; to search or know thoroughly; to ask or seek to understand; to discern or distinguish; also to err, to sin, to be foolish, or perverse.

In Sam. the same word signifies to look, and to be accustomed. See Castell. col. 2523.

That שכל is formed on the same root with a different prefix, is obvious and certain, from the correspondence of significations. This word in Hebrew signifies to understand, or know; to cause to understand; to be wise, or to act wisely; corresponding with the Ch. סכל above; and being a mere dialectical orthography of the word. It signifies also, to deprive, strip, bereave; and to waste, scatter and destroy; also, to cast, as fruit or offspring; also, to prosper.

Ch. to understand, and Ch. שכלל, to complete, to finish; also, to found, to lay the foundation. This is כלל with ש prefixed.

Syr. to found, to finish, to adorn.

Ar. شَكَلَ shakala, to bind under the belly; to gird; to bind the feet; to fetter; to shackle; to form, or fashion; to be dubious, obscure, and intricate; to agree, suit, or answer to; to be like; to have a beautiful form; to know, perceive, or comprehend; to hesitate; to be ignorant. Derivative, a shackle See Castell. col. 3750.

To this root Castle refers the English skill; and it is certain the words correspond both in elements and in sense. Now in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, the verbs corresponding to these Shemitic verbs, signify in Saxon, scylan, to separate, to distinguish; Icelandic and Swedish, skilia, to divide, separate, sever; whence shield, that which separates, and hence defends; D. scheelen, to differ; schillen, to peel, or pare; whence scale and shell. To this root our lexicographers refer skill. The prefix in this word would seem to have the force of a negative, like L. ex. Now is it possible to suppose that these words can be formed from a common root?

The sense of sin and folly is probably from wandering, deviating, as in delirium; and this is only a modification of the primary sense of כל. to stretch or extend; that is, departure, separation. Or the ש has, in these senses, the force of a negative.

The sense of knowing, understanding, is usually or always from taking, holding, or extending to; as we say, I take your meaning. In this application these words would seem to be directly from the Eth. and Ch. כהל, to be able; the Latin calleo, to be hard, and to know or be well skilled. That this word כהל is from the same root as כלל כלא. כלה. we know by the Samaritan ࠊࠋࠋ, which signifies all, and which is a mere dialectical spelling of the Heb. and Ch. כל.

The sense of depriving and wasting, in the Hebrew, is from separation, the sense of the Gothic and Teutonic words; but it is to be noticed that this sense seems to imply throwing, as one mode of parting, and this is also the direct act of founding, laying the foundation.

When we turn our attention to the Arabic, new affinities are disclosed. The first definition is, to bind, to gird, to shackle, and hence the English word. The radical sense of bind is to strain, the sense of hold. And here we arrive at the origin and primary sense of shall, should; Saxon scealan, to be obliged; that is, to be bound or constrained. Hence we see why the words scale, shell and shall, are all written alike in Saxon, sceal; for scale and shell are from peeling, or covering, binding.

From this verb the Saxon has scyld, a crime, or guilt, Lat. scelus, and scyld, a shield. The German has the same word in schuld, guilt, culpability, debt; Dutch, schuld; Danish skulde, should, and scyld, a debt, a fault, a crime; Sw. skuld, the same. This word scyld, skuld, and schuld, is the English should, the preterite of the verb shall; and it is the word used in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Icelandic, and Swiss Lord's Prayer, to express what is rendered in English debts; forgive us our debts. Here we see the primary sense of the word is to be held, or bound; hence, liable. The English word guilt may be from the same root, without a prefix; but whether it is or not, we observe the word expresses more than the English word debt, trespass, or offence; it comprehends the sense of fault, or sin, with that of being held, or liable to answer or to punishment. Debt, in the modern use of the word, implies the latter, but not the former; trespass and offence imply the sin, but not the liability to answer. We have no English word that includes both senses, except guilt, and this seems to be hardly adequate to express the full sense of scyld.

To account for the various significations of the same word, in different languages, and often in the same language, it is necessary to find the primary action expressed by the root; and in compound words it is necessary to observe or ascertain the different effects produced on the original word by the prefixes. Thus the verb inculpo in Low Latin signifies to excuse; but some modern writers use inculpate in a directly different sense; that is, to blame.

In like manner impartible has two different significations; that may be imparted; and in law, not partible, or divisible. Such is the fact also with impassionate. We are persuaded a vast number of instances of similar diversities in the application of prefixes may be found in the Shemitic languages; and this will account for differences which otherwise seem utterly irreconcilable.

We find in our mother tongue, that the same word signifies to heal, and to conceal, Lat. celo; Saxon hel, health; helan, helan, to heal, to conceal; ge-helan, and ge-helan, to heal, and to conceal; Old English hele. Hence we see that the English heal and the Latin celo are the same word differently applied, but from a common signification, which is to make strong or fast, or to hold, from the sense of pressing. Or perhaps the Latin celo may have this sense of holding, restraining; and heal may rather be from making perfect. No. 2, supra.

We may now also see the radical sense of holy; Saxon hal and ge-hal, whole, sound, safe; halig, holy; halgian, to hallow. If this word contains the sense of separation, or driving off, like Latin sacer, as it may, it is from shutting, confining, or restraining intercourse. But we are inclined to believe the primary sense of holy is sound, entire, coinciding with the radical sense of heal.

Clod, Laudo, Claudo.

In Welsh, clod is praise, from llod, a forcible utterance. This is the English loud, and Lat. laudo, which, with a prefix, becomes plaudo. In Welsh, llodi signifies to reach out, to crave, from the radical sense of llod, to thrust out or extend; but according to Owen, llodi is from llawd, which signifies a shooting out, or a going onward, productiveness, a lad, and as an adjective, tending forward, craving, lewd; llodig, craving, brimming; llodineb, lewdness. Now, beyond all question, these words are the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, and Samaritan ילד, to beget; to bring forth; to cause to be born; and as a noun, a child of either sex, a lad. The Arabians and Ethiopians use vau or waw, where the Hebrews use yod. The Arabic corresponding word is وَلَدَ walada, the Ethiopic ወለደ walad, to beget, to bring forth.

But this is not all. In Greek, the verb κλειω, a contraction of κλειδοω, signifies to praise, to celebrate. Here we have precisely the Welsh llod above, corresponding with the Latin laudo and plaudo. But the same Greek word κλειω, κλειδοω, signifies to shut or make fast. This is the Latin cludo, claudo. The Saxons used h for the Greek κ and the Latin c; and with these words accords the Saxon hlid, a cover; English, a lid; that which shuts or makes fast. That these words are all from one root, is a fact, apparent beyond any reasonable doubt; nor is there the least difficulty in ascertaining the affinity, for the radical sense, to reach forward, to thrust, to strain, solves the whole mystery. To thrust, gives the sense of begetting and producing; to strain or throw out the voice, gives the sense of praise: and to thrust or press together, gives the sense of closing and making fast. In this manner, words, which at first view appear to have no connection, will, when pursued through different languages, assimilate and unite, not only without forced analogies, but in defiance of all preconceived opinions; and the reluctant mind is at last compelled to admit their identity.

There is another set of words whose derivation from the same root is very certain, though perhaps less obvious. These are the Danish slutter, to shut, close, conclude, finish, determine; slutter, a key-keeper, a jailer; Swedish sluta, claudere, obserare, to shut, or shut up, or end; slott, a castle; D. sleutel, a key; slot, a lock, a castle, a conclusion; sluiten, to shut, lock, close, stop, conclude; G. schloss, a lock; schliessen, to close, conclude, finish, fetter, shackle; schleuse, a sluice; D. sluis, id. Eng. sluice, that is, which shuts or fastens; Low Latin, exclusa. See Spelman's Glossary. These words are unequivocally formed from the root of claudo, clausi, by the prefix s, just as the Welsh yslac, slack, loose, is formed on llac, and yspeiliaw, on yspail, spoil, and this on the root of peel. We observe all the Teutonic dialects use the dental t, as the final radical, except the German. The Latins use both the dental and a sibilant, claudo, clausi, clausus.

If the Danish lyd, sound, Sw. lyda, to sound, is the same word as English loud, these words belong to this family.

Cradle.

Another example. The English word cradle, Saxon cradel, is in Welsh cryd, a rocking, a shaking, a cradle. In Welsh, the verbs crydu, crydiaw, crydian, signify to shake, to tremble. These correspond to the Irish creatham, to shake; Greek κραδαω, to shake, to swing. The Welsh verbs are by Owen deduced from rhyd, which signifies a moving. Now רעד in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Ethiopic, signifies to shake or tremble.

The same word in Arabic, رعد, signifies to thunder; to impress terror; to tremble; to shake. This coincides with the Latin rudo, to roar, to bray; and we know from the voice of the ass, that roughness or shaking is an ingredient in the sense of this word. We know it also from rudis, one of the affinities of rudo. There is also in Arabic, راد, which is rendered to run hither and thither; to move one way and the other; to tremble; to shake. In Hebrew חרד signifies to tremble or shake, and to palpitate; in Syriac and Eth. to rub or scrape. This connects the word directly with cradle, through the Hebrew; and through the Syriac, with the Latin rado. Here again we find the sense of roughness or grating. Then turning to the Welsh, we find grydiaw, which signifies to utter a rough sound; to shout, whoop, or scream; grydwst, a murmur, from gryd, a shout or whoop, and this from rhyd, the word above mentioned; so that crydu, to shake, whence cradle, is from the same root as grydiaw, to shout, and this is the Italian gridare; Sp. and Port. gritar; Saxon grædan; Swedish gråta; Danish græder; Dutch kryten: German greiten. This word in French is contracted, by the omission of the last radical, into crier for crider; whence, probably, we have cry, W. cri. Hence we find that the sense of cry is to utter a rough sound; and this is connected with the braying of the ass, with shaking, trembling, and with roaring, murmuring, and thunder. The connection in this example is so marked as to preclude all hesitation as to the identity of the words.

The Shemitic roots גרד, חרט, חרת, and קרד, all, in some of the languages of that stock, coincide in sense and elements with the English grate, French gratter; and if the first letter is a prefix, they would seem to unite with the Latin rado. But this is a point we would not undertake to determine.

One fact more. The Welsh cri, above mentioned, signifies a cry; and as an adjective, rough, raw. Now this coincides with the Latin crudus, in sense; and crudus with the Welsh cryd, above mentioned.

The Dan. brygger Eng. to brew, are probably connected with break, with freckle, and with rough. So under this root, the Welsh grediaw, signifies to heat, scorch, parch, whence greidyll, a griddle, from graid, that shoots in rays, heat, ardency, from gra, that shoots, or rises, as the nap or frieze of cloth. The latter is probably a contracted word, of the same family, but not the root, as Owen supposes. But the radical sense implies a shaking, agitation, and roughness.

Meet, Mete, Measure.

Saxon.—Metan, to put, to place; Fr. mettre, It. mettere, Sp. and Port. meter, Lat mitto.

Mætan, metan, to find, to meet, or meet with; to paint; to dream; to measure, to mete, Lat. metior, metor, Gr. μετρεω, μετρον, Lat. mensus, with a casual n, that is, mesus, Fr. mesure.

Ametan, gemetan, to meet, to find, to measure.

Gemeting, gemetung, a meeting.

Gemet, gemete, fit, suitable, Eng. meet; also, painted or pourtrayed.

Gemetegan, gemetian, to moderate; gemetlic, moderate, modest.

Mete, measure, mode, Lat. modius, modus.

Metre, measure in verse, meter [not metre].

Metere, an inventor, a painter.

Mæte, middling [mediocris,] modest, moderate.

Mot, gemot, a meeting, a council.

Witena-gemot, a council of wise men.

Motian, to meet, especially for debate. Eng to moot.

Gothic.—Motyan, gamotyan, to meet, to find.

Mota, a place for the receipt of toll or customs.

Dutch.—Ontmoeten, to meet, to encounter.

Meeten, and toemeeten, to measure.

Meeter, a measurer.

Gemoeten, to meet; gemoet, a meeting.

German.—Mass, measure, meter; masse, moderation.

Messen, vermessen, to measure; messer, a measurer.

Gemäss, measure; also conformable, suitable; Eng. meet, suitable; German gemässigt, temperate, moderate.

Swedish.—Möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. [This is the sense of finding.]

Möte, a meeting.

Mot, and emot, toward, against; as in motstå, to stand against, to resist.

Mäta, to measure; mått, measure, meter, mode.

Måttelig, moderate, middling, frugal, temperate.

Mätta, to be sufficient, to satisfy, to cloy.

Danish.—Möder, to meet, to convene; möde or mode, a meeting; mod, contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, for, on, by, aside, abreast, as in modsetter, to set against, to oppose; modsiger, to say against, to contradict; modvind, a contrary wind.

Moed, moden, ripe, mellow, mature. [Qu. Lat. mitis.]

Mode, manner, fashion. [Probably from the Latin.]

Maade, measure, form, style of writing, way, mode, manner, fashion. [This is the native Danish word corresponding to the Lat. modus.]

Maadelig, moderate, temperate.

Mæt, enough, sufficient; mætter, to satisfy, or sate, to glut.

From the same root are the G. mit, D. met, mede, Sw. and Dan med, Gr. μετα, signifying with.

By the first signification of the Saxon mætan, or metan, we find that this word, which is the English meet, is also the French mettre, and Lat. mitto, the sense of which is to throw or send, to put, to lay. Meet is only a modification of the same sense, to come to, to fall, to reach, hence to find; as we say, to fall on.

The sense of painting or pourtraying is peculiar to the Saxon. We are not confident that this sense is from finding; but we observe that metere is rendered an inventor and a painter. The sense of paint, then, may be to find out, to devise, or contrive.

The sense of dreaming is also peculiar to the Saxon. The sense may be to devise or imagine, or it may be to rove, as in some other words of like signification. If so, this sense will accord with the Syriac ܚܠܡ, infra.

The other significations present no difficulty. To meet, is to come to, to reach in proceeding or in extending; hence to find. The primary sense of measure is to extend, to stretch to the full length or size of a thing.

Meet, fit, suitable, like par, peer, pair, is from extending or reaching to. So suit is from the Latin sequor, through the French, to follow, to press, or reach toward. See par, under ברא, supra.

The English meet and mete appear to be from the Saxon dialect, but moot from the Gothic.

Let it be remarked that the Saxon meet and mete, are united in the same orthography; and in the Dutch the orthography is not very different; ontmoeten, gemoeten, to meet, and meeten, to measure. Not so in the other languages.

In German, mass is measure, and messen, to measure; but the sense of meet does not occur. Yet that mass is the same word as meet, fit, varied only in dialect, appears from this, that gemäss, with a prefix, is suitable, answering to the English meet.

The Swedish and Danish words follow the Gothic orthography; Swedish möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. These significations give the sense of finding, and are closely allied to the senses of the Arabic verb مدّ madda, infra.

The Danish verb is möder, to meet, but in both the Swedish and Danish, the sense of measure is expressed by a different orthography. Sw. mäta, to measure; mått, measure; Dan. maade, measure, mode. In these two languages we find also the sense of sufficiency, and to satisfy. See infra, the Ar. مدّ and Heb. and Ch. מצא.

But in these Gothic dialects, there is one application of meeting which deserves more particular notice. In Swedish, mot and emot is a preposition of the same signification as the English against. It is rendered toward, against. So in Danish, mod is contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, by, aside, abreast. This preposition is the simple verb, without any addition of letters, prefix or suffix. We hence learn that the sense of such prepositions is a meeting or coming to, which gives the sense of to or toward; but when one meets another in front, it gives the sense of opposition, or contrary direction. This coming to or meeting, may be for a friendly purpose, and hence in one's favour, like for in English. Thus in Danish, "Guds godhed mod os," God's goodness or mercy toward us. In other cases, mod signifies against, and implies counteraction or opposition; as modgift, an antidote; modgang, adversity. So for in English signifies toward, or in favour of; and also opposition and negation, as in forbid.

In the Danish we find moed, moden, ripe, mature. We shall see this sense in the Chaldee מטא. The sense is to reach, extend, or come to.

The Latin modus is from this root, and, by its orthography, it seems to have been received from the Gothic race. The sense is measure, limit, from extending, or comprehending. This then becomes the radix of many words which express limitation or restraint, as moderate, modest, modify; a sense directly contrary to that of the radical verb.

This leads us a step further. In Saxon, Gothic, and other northern languages, mod, moed, signifies mind, courage, spirit, anger, whence English moody. The primary sense is an advancing or rushing forward, which expresses mind or intention, that is, a setting or stretching forward, and also spirit, animation, heat, and lastly, anger. So the Latin animus gives rise to animosity; and the Greek μενος, mind, signifies also, strength, force, vehemence, and anger. Mania is from the same radical sense.

Let us now connect this root or these roots, with the Shemitic languages.

In Hebrew and Chaldee, מדד signifies to measure; מד, a measure. This coincides with the Latin metior, and Gr. μετρεω, as well as with the Saxon, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish, which all write the word with a dental, but the German is mass.

In Syriac, ܡܕ mad, signifies to escape, to get free, that is, to depart, a modification of the sense of extending in the Arabic. A derivative in Syriac signifies a duty, toll or tribute; and we have seen in the Gothic, that mota is a toll-house. It may be from measuring, that is, a portion, or perhaps income.

This word in Arabic, مَدَّ madda, signifies,

1. To stretch or extend, to draw out, to make or be long, to delay or give time, to forbear, to bring forth. To extend is the radical sense of measure.

2. To separate, or throw off or out; to secern, secrete, or discharge. Hence to become matter or sanies, to produce pus, to maturate. Here we have the origin of the word matter, in the sense of pus. It is an excretion, from throwing out, separating, freeing, discharging. Here we have the sense of the Latin mitto, emitto.

3. To assist, to supply. This sense is probably from coming to, that is, to approach or visit. "I was sick, and ye visited me. I was in prison, and ye came to me." Matt. xxv.

This application coincides with the English meet, but particularly with the Swedish and Danish sense of the word.

4. To make thin, to attenuate; probably from stretching.

Among the Arabic nouns formed under this root, we find a measure, or modius, showing that this verb is the same as the Chaldee and Hebrew; we find also matter or pus, and lenity. Qu. Lat. mitis.

In Chaldee, מטא or מטה signifies to come to, to happen, to reach, [to meet,] to be ripe or mature, to cause to come, to bring or produce. The first sense gives that of finding, and the latter gives that of maturing, and we observe that matter, or pus, is from the Arabic مَدَّ madda, and the sense of mature, from the Chaldee מטא mita. Yet in the use of maturate, from the Latin maturo, we connect the words, for to maturate is to ripen, and to generate matter.

In Syriac, this verb signifies the same as the Chaldee, to come to; and also to be strong, to prevail, that is, to strain or stretch, the radical sense of power.

In Hebrew, מצא has the sense of the foregoing verb in the Chaldee, to find, to come to, to happen.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to find, and to be strong, to prevail; hence both in Hebrew and Chaldee, to be sufficient. Here we see the Danish and Swedish mætter, and mätta, to be sufficient. This is also meet, dialectically varied.

In Syriac, also, this verb signifies to be strong or powerful; also in Pah. to bring or press out, to defecate, which sense unites this word with the Heb. מצה, to press, to squeeze. In Ethiopic, this verb signifies to come, to happen, to cause to come, to bring in, to bring forth. Now it is evident that מצא, and the Chaldee מטא, are dialectical forms of the same word; the former coinciding with the German mass in orthography, but with the other languages in signification.

In Chaldee, מצע signifies the middle, and as a verb, to set in the middle, to pass the middle; in Syriac, to be divided in the middle. Qu. Is not this a branch of the family of meet?

In Chaldee, אמד amad, to measure, is evidently from מד, with a prefix or formative א. This word, in Syriac, signifies, like the simple verb, to escape, to be liberated. In Pael, to liberate.

In Arabic, this verb أَمَدَ amida, signifies to be terminated, to end, whence the noun, an end, limit, termination, Latin meta, which, Ainsworth informs us, signifies, in a metaphorical sense, a limit. The fact is the reverse; this is its primary and literal sense, and that of a pillar and goal are particular appropriations of that sense.

In Hebrew, נמד signifies a cubit, a measure of length.

The same in the Rabbinic, from מד, with a prefix.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to be contracted, to shrink.

Is not this sense from מד, measure, modus, a limit, or a drawing.

That the Shemitic words, מדד, מטא, מצא and אמד, are words of the same stock with meet, mete, Lat. metior, there can be no doubt; but it is not easy to understand why the different significations of meeting and measuring, should be united in one word, in the Saxon language, when they are expressed by very different words in the Shemitic, and in most of the Teutonic languages. We know, indeed, that in German a sibilant letter is often used, in words which are written with a dental in all the other kindred languages. But in this case the German mass, measure, must coincide with מד, as must the Swedish mäta, and Dan. maade, and the Saxon metan, Dutch gemoeten, Goth. motyan, Sw. möta, Dan. möder, with the Chaldee מטא, but not with the word מצא.

It may not be impossible nor improbable that all these words are from one stock or radix, and that the different orthographies and applications are dialectical changes of that root, introduced among different families or races of men, before languages were reduced to writing.

In the Latin mensus, from metior, the n is probably casual, the original being mesus, as in the French mésure. We have reason to think there are many instances of this insertion of n before d and s.

From this exhibition of words and their significations, we may fairly infer the common origin of the following words. Lat. mitto, French mettre, English meet, to come to, meet, fit, and mete, to measure, Lat. metior, metor, G. μετρον, μετρεω, Lat. mensura, Fr. mésure, Eng. measure, Lat. modus, mode, Sax. and Goth. mod, mind, anger, whence moody, Eng. moot, Lat. maturus, mature, and Eng. matter.

In Welsh, madu signifies to cause to proceed; to send, [Lat. mitto;] to suffer to go off; to render productive; to become beneficial; and mâd signifies what proceeds or goes forward, hence what is good; and mad, the adjective, signifies proceeding, advancing, progressive, good or beneficial. This word then affords a clear proof of the radical sense of good. We have like evidence in the English better, best, and in prosperity, which is from the Greek προφερω, to advance.

In Welsh also we find madrez, matter, pus; madru, to dissolve, to putrefy, to become pus. That these words are from the same root as the Arabic مدّ supra, we think to be very obvious; and here we observe that the Welsh have one important sense derived from the root, that of good, which occurs in none of the other languages. But the primary sense is the same as that of the other significations, to go forward, to advance; hence to promote interest or happiness. Here we have undeniable evidence that the sense of good, Welsh mad, and the sense of matter, pus, proceed from the same radix.

LEGO.

The Greek λεγω is rendered, to speak or say; to tell, count, or number; to gather, collect, or choose; to discourse; and to lie down. This last definition shows that this word is the English lie and lay; and from this application, doubtless, the Latins had their lectus, a bed, that is, a spread, a lay.

The Latin lego, the same verb, is rendered, to gather; to choose; to read; to steal, or collect by stealing; and the phrase, legere oram, signifies to coast, to sail along a coast; legere vela, is to furl the sails; legere halitum, to take breath; legere littus, to sail close to the shore; legere milites, to enlist or muster soldiers; legere pugno, to strike, perhaps to lay on with the fist.

It would seem, at first view, that such various significations cannot proceed from one radix. But the fact that they do is indubitable. The primary sense of the root must be to throw, strain or extend, which in this, as in almost all cases, gives the sense of speaking. The sense of collecting, choosing, gathering, is from throwing, or drawing out, or separating by some such act; or from throwing together. The sense of lying down is probably, from throwing one's self down. The sense of reading, in Latin, is the same as that of speaking, in the Greek, unless it may be from collecting, that is, separating the letters, and uniting them in syllables and words; for in the primitive mode of writing, diacritical points were not used. But probably the sense of reading is the same as in speaking.

The phrases legere oram, legere littus, in Latin, may coincide with that of our seamen, to stretch or lay along the shore or coast, or to hug the land; especially if this word lay in Sanscrit, signifies to cling, as we have seen it stated in some author, but for which we cannot vouch. If this sense is attached to the word, it proves it closely allied to the L. ligo, to bind.

That the sense of throwing, or driving, is contained in this word, is certain from its derivatives. Thus, in Greek, απολεγω signifies to select, to collect; and also to reject, to repudiate, and to forbid; which imply throwing, thrusting away.

Now, if throwing, sending, or driving, is the primary sense, then the Latin lego, to read, and lego, legare, to send, are radically the same word; the inflections of the verb being varied, arbitrarily, to designate the distinct applications, just as in pello, appello, appellere, to drive, and appello, appellare, to call.

And here it may be worth a moment's consideration, whether several words with prefixes, such as slay, flog, and the Latin plico, W. plygu, are not formed on the root of lay, that is, lag or lak. The sense of slay, Sax. slagan, slæan, is properly to strike, to beat; hence in Saxon, "Hig slogon heora wedd," they slew their league or contract; that is, they struck a bargain. It signifies also to throw, as to slag one into prison; also to fall; to set or lay. The sense of killing is derivative from that of striking, a striking down.

Flog, Lat. fligo, signifies, primarily, to rush, drive, strike, Eng. to lick; and if formed on the root of lay, is precisely the popular phrase, to lay on.

If plico is formed with a prefix on lay or its root, it must have been originally pelico, that is, belico, belay. Then to fold, would be to lay on or close; to lay one part to another. Now this word is the Welsh plygu, to fold, which Owen makes to be a compound of py and lly. The latter word must be a contraction of llyg.

We know that the word reply is from the French repliquer, the Latin replico. Now, to reply, is not to fold back, but to send back, to throw back, as words or an answer; and this gives the precise sense of lay, to throw, to send, which must be the sense of the radical word.

It is no inconsiderable evidence of the truth of our conjecture, that we constantly use the phrase to lay on, or lay to, as synonymous with ply, a word belonging to this family. To pledge, another of this family, is to lay down, to deposit; and the primary sense of play, Saxon plegan, Dan. leger, Sw. leka, is to strike or drive.

In Welsh, lluçiaw signifies to throw, fling, cast, or dart; to pelt; to drift; from lluç, a darting, a flash, glance, or sudden throw; hence lluçed, lightning. Llug signifies also, that breaks, or begins to open, a gleam, a breaking out in blotches; the plague. Llwg signifies also, that is apt to break out, that is bright, a tumour, eruption. These words coincide with English light, Lat. luceo; the primary sense of which is to throw, shoot, or dart; and these words all contain the elements of flog and fling.

In Welsh, llyçu signifies to fall flat, to lie extended, or to squat. This is evidently allied to lay and lie.

These senses agree also with that of luck, to fall, or come suddenly; that is, to rush or drive along.

In Russ. vlagayu is to lay, or put in; equivalent to the German einlegen.

The Latin fluo is contracted from flugo; and the radical sense of flow is the same as that of light. So the river Aar, in Europe, is doubtless from the same source as the Oriental אור. to shine, whence air. And נהר which, in Hebrew, signifies to flow as water, as well as to shine, chiefly signifies in Chaldee and Syriac, to shine.

To show the great importance, or rather the absolute necessity, of ascertaining the primary sense of words, in order to obtain clear ideas of the sense of ancient authors, more particularly of difficult passages in dead languages, let the reader attend to the following remarks.

In commenting on certain parts of Isaiah xxviii. Lowth observes in his Preliminary Dissertation, the difficulty of determining the meaning of חזות in verse 15th. In our version, as in others, it is rendered agreement; but, says Lowth, "the word means no such thing in any part of the Bible, except in the 18th verse following; nor can the lexicographers give any satisfactory account of the word in this sense." Yet he agrees with Vitringa, that in these passages it must have this signification. The difficulty, it seems, has arisen from not understanding the primary sense of seeing, for the verb generally signifies to see; and as a noun the word signifies sight, vision; and so it is rendered in the Latin version annexed to Vanderhooght's Bible. The Seventy render it by συνθηκη, a covenant or league; and they are followed by the moderns. "Nous avons intelligence avec le sepulchre:" French. "Noi habbiam fatta lega col sepulcro:" Italian of Diodati.

Parkhurst understands the word to signify, to fasten, to settle, and he cites 2 Sam. xx. 9, יאחז. "Joab took Amasa by the beard." Here the sense is obvious; and from this and other passages, we may infer with certainty, that the radical sense is to reach to, or to seize, hold, or fix. If the sense is to reach to, then it accords with covenant, conveniens, coming to; if the sense is to fix, or fasten, then it agrees with league, Lat. ligo, and with pact, pactum, from pango, to make fast; all from the sense of extension, stretching, straining. Hence the meaning of חזה. the breast; that is, the firm, fixed, strong part. And if the English gaze is the same word, which is not improbable, this determines the appropriate sense of seeing in this word, to be to fix, or to look or reach with the eye fixed.

But we have other and decisive evidence of the primary signification of this word in the obvious, undisputed meaning of אחז. the same word with a prefix, which signifies to catch, or lay hold on; to seize; hence behind, following, as if attached to; and hence drawing out in time, to delay.

Now it is not improbable that the Arabic حَوَزَ hauza, may be a word of the same stock; and this signifies, among other senses, to collect, contract, or draw together, to accumulate, to have intercourse or commerce with another. The latter sense would give nearly the signification of the Hebrew word.

Lexicographers are often embarrassed to account for the different signification of words that are evidently derived from the same root. Thus, in Hebrew, שור is rendered to sing; to look, behold, or observe; and to rule; and its derivatives, a ruler, a wall, the navel-string, a chain, or necklace, &c. How can a word signify to rule, and to sing, and to look? Nothing can be more easy or natural. The sense is, in both cases, to stretch or strain, to reach. To sing is to strain the voice; to rule is to restrain men; and to see is to reach, or to hold in view.

In Latin, sero signifies to sow, to plant, to beget, to spread; consero, to sow, and to close or join; desero, to leave off, to desert; assero, to plant by or near, and to assert, affirm, and pronounce; dissero, to discourse; insero, to insert, to implant; resero, to unlock, to open, to disclose. Desero, to desert, Ainsworth says, is a compound of de and sero, "ut sit desertum quod non seritur nec colitur." And dissero he supposes must be a metaphorical use of the word. Now, on the principles we have unfolded, nothing is easier than an explanation of these words. The sense of sero is to throw, to thrust; its literal sense is applied to sowing and planting: consero is to thrust or drive together; desero is to throw from; assero is to throw in words, or to throw out, as in appello; dissero is to throw words or arguments, with the sense of spreading, expatiating; insero is to throw or thrust in; resero is to throw or drive from, hence to unlock or open.

It is by resorting to the primary idea of words, that we are able to explain applications, apparently, or in fact, diverse and even contrary. A very common example of this contrariety occurs in words which signify to guard or defend. For instance, the Latin arceo signifies to drive off, and to protect, secure, hold, restrain, or keep from departing or escaping; two senses directly opposite. This is extremely natural; for arceo signifies to thrust off, repel, drive back; and this act defends the person or object attacked. Or if we suppose the sense of straining to be anterior to that of repulsion, which is not improbable, then the act of straining or holding produces both effects; to repel or stop what advances to assault, and protect what is inclosed or assaulted. The words guard and warren present a similar application of the primary idea; and all languages which we have examined, furnish a multitude of similar examples.

These examples illustrate the utility of extensive researches in language; as all cognate languages throw light on each other; one language often retaining the radical meaning of a word which the others have lost. Who, for instance, that is acquainted only with the English use of the verb to have, would suspect that this word and happen are radically one, and that the primary sense is to fall or rush, hence to fall on and seize? Yet nothing is more certain. In the Spanish language the senses of both verbs are retained in haber; and the Welsh hapiaw gives us the true original signification.

In like manner the primary sense of venio in Latin, cannot be certainly determined, without resorting to other words, and to kindred languages. In Latin, the word signifies to come or arrive; but in Spanish, venida, from venir, the Latin venio, signifies not only a coming or arrival, but an attack in fencing. Venio coincides in origin with the English find; Saxon findan; German and Dutch finden, to find, to fall or light on; Danish finder; Swedish finna, to find, to discover, to meet, to strike against, [offendere]. The primary sense of venio, then, is not merely to come or arrive, but to rush or move with a driving force; and this sense is applicable to coming or going.

That the primary sense is to fall or rush, we have evidence in the Latin ventus, and English wind, both from the root of this verb. We have still further evidence in the word venom, which in Welsh is gwenwyn; gwen, white, and gwyn, rage, smart, whence gwynt, wind. Venom is that which frets or excites a raging pain. Hence we may infer that Latin venor, to hunt, to chase, is of the same family; and so is venia, leave, or leave to depart, or a departure, a leaving, coinciding in signification with leave.

The latter word, venia, proves another fact, that the primary sense of venio is, in general, to move in any direction, and that the Latin sense, to come, is a particular appropriation of that sense.

In ascertaining the primary sense of words, it is often useful or necessary to recur to the derivatives. Thus the Latin lædo is rendered to hurt; but, by adverting to allido, elido, and collido, we find that the original signification is to strike, hit, or dash against. Hurt, then, is the secondary sense; the effect of the primary action expressed by the verb.

So the Latin rapio, to seize, does not give the sense of rapidus, rapid; but the sense of the latter proves the primary sense of rapio to be to rush, and in its application, to rush on and seize.

These examples will be sufficient to show how little the affinities of language have been understood. Men have been generally satisfied with a knowledge of the appropriate sense of words, without examining from what visible or physical action, or primary sense, that particular application has been derived. Hence the obscurity that still rests on the theory of language. It has been supposed that each word, particularly each verb, has an original specific sense, or application, distinct from every other verb. We find, however, on a close examination and comparison of the same word in different languages, that the fact is directly the reverse; that a verb expressing some action, in a general sense, gives rise to various appropriate senses, or particular applications. And in the course of our researches, we have been struck with the similarity of manner in which different nations have appropriated derivative and figurative senses. For example, all nations, as far as our researches extend, agree in expressing the sense of justice and right, by straightness, and sin, iniquity, wrong, by a deviation from a straight line or course. Equally remarkable is the simplicity of the analogies in language, and the small number of radical significations; so small indeed, that we are persuaded the primary sense of all the verbs in any language, may be expressed by thirty or forty words.

We cannot, at this period of the world, determine, in all cases, which words are primitive, and which are derivative; nor whether the verb or the noun is the original word. Mons. Gebelin, in his Monde Primitif, maintains that the noun is the root of all other words. Never was a greater mistake. That some nouns may have been formed before the verbs with which they are connected, is possible; but as languages are now constructed, it is demonstrably certain, that the verb is the radix or stock from which have sprung most of the nouns, adjectives, and other parts of speech belonging to each family. This is the result of all our researches into the origin of languages. We find, indeed, that many modern verbs are formed on nouns; as to practise from practice; but the noun is derived from a Greek verb. So we use wrong as a verb, from the adjective wrong; but the latter is primarily a participle of the verb to wring. Indeed a large part of all nouns were originally participles or adjectives, and the things which they denote were named from their qualities. So pard, pardus, is from ברד barad, hail; and the animal so named from his spots, as if sprinkled with hail, from the sense of separation or scattering. Crape, the Fr. crêpe, is from crêper, to crisp. Sight signifies, primarily, seen; it being the participle of seon, contracted from sigan. Draught is the participle of draw, that which is drawn, or the act of drawing; thought is the participle of think.

As the verb is the principal radix of other words, and as the proper province of this part of speech is to express action, almost all the modifications of the primary sense of the verb may be comprehended in one word, to move.

The principal varieties of motion or action, may be expressed by the following verbs.

1. To drive, throw, thrust, send, urge, press.
2. To set, fix, lay. But these are usually from thrusting, or throwing down.
3. To strain, stretch, draw; whence holding, binding, strength, power, and often health.
4. To turn, wind, roll, wander.
5. To flow, to blow, to rush.
6. To open, part, split, separate, remove, scatter. See No. 16.
7. To swell, distend, expand, spread.
8. To stir, shake, agitate, rouse, excite.
9. To shoot, as a plant; to grow; allied to No 1.
10. To break, or burst; allied sometimes to No. 3.
11. To lift, raise, elevate; allied to No. 9.
12. To flee, withdraw, escape; to fly; often allied to No. 1.

13. To rage; to burn; allied to Nos. 7 and 8.
14. To fall; to fail; whence fading, dying, &c.
15. To approach, come, arrive, extend, reach. This is usually the sense of gaining. No. 34.
16. To go, walk, pass, advance; allied to No. 6.
17. To seize, take hold; sometimes allied to No. 31.
18. To strike; to beat; allied to No. 1.
19. To swing, to vibrate. No. 29.
20. To lean; to incline; allied to the sense of wandering, or departing.
21. To rub, scratch, scrape; often connected with driving, and with roughness.
22. To swim; to float.
23. To stop, cease, rest; sometimes at least, from straining, holding, fastening.
24. To creep; to crawl; sometimes connected with scraping.
25. To peel, to strip, whence spoiling.
26. To leap, to spring; allied to Nos. 9 and 1.
27. To bring, bear, carry; in some instances connected with producing, throwing out.
28. To sweep.
29. To hang. No. 19.
30. To shrink, or contract; that is, to draw. See No. 3.
31. To run; to rush forward; allied to No. 1.
32. To put on or together; to unite; allied to Nos. 1 and 3.
33. To knit, to weave.
34. To gain, to win, to get. See No. 15.

These and a few more verbs express the literal sense of all the primary roots. But it must be remarked that all the foregoing significations are not distinct. So far from it, that the whole may be brought under the signification of a very few words. The English words to send, throw, thrust, strain, stretch, draw, drive, urge, press, embrace the primary sense of a great part of all the verbs in every language which we have examined. Indeed, it must be so, for the verb is certainly the root of most words; and the verb expresses motion, which always implies the application of force.

Even the verbs which signify to hold or stop, in most instances at least, if not all, denote, primarily, to strain or restrain by exertion of force: and to lie is, primarily, to throw down, to lay one's self down. So that intransitive verbs are rarely exceptions to the general remark above made, that all verbs primarily express motion or exertion of force. The substantive verb has more claims to be an exception than any other; for this usually denotes, we think, permanence or continued being, but the primary sense of this verb may perhaps be to set or fix; and verbs having this sense often express extension in time or duration. So τεινω in Greek, is to stretch, but the same word teneo in Latin, is to hold, hence continuance.

Let us now attend to the radical sense of some of the most common verbs.

Speaking, calling, crying, praying, utterance of sounds, is usually from the sense of driving or straining. Thus in Latin appello and compello, though of a different conjugation from pello, depello, impello, are from the same root, and although the Latin repello does not signify to recall, yet the corresponding word in Italian, rappellare, and the French rappeler, signify to recall, and hence the English repeal. Hence also peal, either of a bell or of thunder. This is the Greek βαλλω, and probably παλλω is from the same root. The sense of striking is found in the Greek verb, and so it is in the Latin loquor, English clack. But in general, speaking, in all its modifications, is the straining, driving, or impulse of sounds. Sometimes the sense coincides more exactly with that of breaking or bursting.

Singing is a driving or straining of the voice: and we apply strain to a passage of music, and to a course of speaking.

We are not confident that we can refer the sensation of hearing to any visible action. Possibly it may sometimes be from striking, hitting, touching. But we observe that hear is connected in origin with ear, as the Latin audio is with the Greek ους, ωτος, the ear; whence it appears probable that the verb to hear, is formed from the name of the ear, and the ear is from some verb which signifies to shoot or extend, for it signifies a limb.

The primary sense of seeing, is commonly to extend to, to reach; as it were, to reach with the eye. Hence the use of behold, for the radical sense of hold is to strain; and hence its signification in beholden, held, bound, obligated. See the verb SEE in the Dictionary.

The sense of look may be somewhat different from that of see. It appears, in some instances, to have for its primary signification, to send, throw, cast; that is, to send or cast the eye or sight.

The primary sense of feeling is to touch, hit, or strike; and probably this is the sense of taste.

Wonder and astonishment are usually expressed by some word that signifies to stop or hold. Hence the Latin miror, to wonder, is the Armoric miret, to stop, hold, hinder; coinciding with the English moor, and Spanish amarrar, to moor, as a ship.

To begin is to come, or fall on; to thrust on. We have a familiar example in the Latin incipio, in and capio; for capio is primarily to fall or rush on and seize. See BEGIN in the Dictionary.

Attempt is expressed by straining, stretching, as in Latin tento. See ASSAY and ESSAY.

Power, strength, and the corresponding verb, to be able, are usually expressed by straining, stretching, and this is the radical sense of ruling or governing. Of this the Latin rego is an example, which gives rectus, right, that is, stretched, straight.

Care, as has been stated, is usually from straining, that is, a tension of the mind.

Thinking is expressed by setting. To think is to set or fix or hold in the mind. It approaches to the sense of suppose, Latin suppono.

And under this word, let us consider the various applications of the Latin puto. The simple verb puto is rendered to prune, lop, or dress, as vines, that is, according to Ainsworth, putum, i. e. purum reddo, purgo, by which we understand him to mean, that putum is either a change of purum, or used for it; a most improbable supposition, for the radical letters t and r are not commutable. Puto is rendered also, to make even, clear, adjust, or cast up accounts; also to think or consider; to suppose; to debate. Its compounds are amputo, to cut off, prune, amputate, to remove; computo, to compute, to reckon, to think or deem; disputo, to make clear, to adjust, or settle, to dispute, or debate, to reason; imputo, to impute, to ascribe or lay to, to place to account; reputo, to consider, to revolve, to reckon up, to impute. The Latin deputo signifies to think, judge, or esteem, to account or reckon, and to prune; but the Italian deputare, Spanish diputar, and French deputer, from the Latin word, all signify to send. How can the sense of think, and that of lop or prune, be deduced from a common root or radical sense? We find the solution of this question in the verb to depute. The primary sense is to throw, thrust, or send, or to set or lay, which is from throwing, driving. To prune is to separate, remove, or drive off; to force off; to think is a setting in the mind; to compute is to throw or put together, either in the mind or in numbers, to dispute is to throw against or apart, like debate, to beat from; to impute is to throw or put to or on; and to repute is to think or throw in the mind repeatedly. To amputate is to separate by cutting round. Puto then in Latin is from the same root, probably, as the English put, or the same word differently applied; and also the Dutch pooten, to plant, poot, a paw, a twig, or shoot, Gr. φυτον, &c.

In attempting to discover the primary sense of words, we are to carry our reflections back to the primitive state of mankind, and consider how rude men would effect their purposes, before the invention or use of the instruments which the moderns employ. The English verb to cut, signifies, ordinarily, to separate with an edged tool; and we are apt to consider this as the chief and original sense. But if so, how can cut, the stroke of a whip, which is a legitimate sense of the word, be deduced from the act of severing by an edged tool? We have, in this popular use of the word, a clue to guide us to the primary sense, which is, to drive, urge, press, and applied to the arm, to strike. But we have better evidence. In the popular practice of speaking, it is not uncommon to hear one person call to another when running, and say, Cut on, cut on, that is, hurry, run faster, drive, press on; probably from striking a beast which one rides on. This is the original sense of the word. Hence we see that this verb is the Latin cædo, to strike, to cut down, somewhat differently applied, and cado, to fall, is only a modified sense of the same root, and the compounds incido, to cut, and incido, to fall on, are of one family. To cut is, therefore, primarily, to strike, or drive; and to cut off, if applied to the severing of bodies, before edged tools were used, was to force off, or to strike off; hence the sense of separating in the phrase to cut off a retreat or communication.

So the Latin carpo is the English carve, originally to separate by plucking, pulling, seizing and tearing, afterwards, by cutting.

Asking is usually expressed by the sense of pressing, urging. We have a clear proof of this in the Latin peto and its compounds. This verb signifies, primarily, to rush, to drive at, to assault; and this sense, in Dictionaries, ought to stand first in the order of definitions. We have the force of the original in the words impetus and impetuous. So the Latin rogo coincides in elements with reach.

The act of understanding is expressed by reaching or taking, holding, sustaining; the sense of comprehend, and of understand. We have a popular phrase which well expresses this sense, "I take your meaning or your idea." So in German, begreifen, to begripe, to apprehend.

Knowing seems to have the same radical sense as understanding.

Pain, grief, distress, and the like affections, are usually expressed by pressure or straining. Affliction is from striking.

Joy, mirth, and the like affections, are from the sense of rousing, exciting, lively action.

Covering, and the like actions, are from spreading over or cutting off, interruption.

Hiding is from covering or from withdrawing, departure; or concealment may be from withholding, restraining, suppressing, or making fast, as in the Latin celo.

Heat usually implies excitement; but as the effect of heat as well as of cold is sometimes to contract, we think both are sometimes from the same radix. Thus cold and the Lat caleo, to be warm, and callus and calleo, to be hard, have all the same elementary letters, and we suppose them all to be from one root, the sense of which is, to draw, strain, shrink, contract. We are the more inclined to this opinion, for these words coincide with calleo, to be strong or able, to know; a sense that implies straining and holding.

Hope is probably from reaching forward. We express strong desire by longing, reaching toward.

Earnestness, boldness, daring, peril, promptness, readiness, willingness, love and favour, are expressed by advancing or inclining.

Light is often expressed by opening, or the shooting of rays, radiation; and probably in many cases, the original word was applied to the dawn of day in the morning. Whiteness is often connected in origin with light. We have an instance of this in the Latin caneo, to shine and to be white.

And that the primary sense of this word is to shoot, to radiate, that is, to throw out or off, we have evidence in the verb cano, to sing, whence canto, the sense of which is retained in our popular use of cant; to cant a stone; to cant over a cask; give the thing a cant; for all these words are from one stock.

The Latin virtus, the English worth, is from the root of vireo, to grow, that is, to stretch forward, to shoot; hence the original sense is strength, a sense we retain in its application to the qualities of plants. Hence the Latin sense of virtus is bravery, coinciding with the sense of boldness, a projecting forward.

Pride is from swelling or elevation, the primary sense of some other words nearly allied to it.

Fear is usually from shrinking or from shaking, trembling; or sometimes, perhaps, from striking, a being struck, as with surprise.

Holiness and sacredness are sometimes expressed by separation, as from common things. The Teutonic word holy, however, seems to be from the sense of soundness, entireness.

Faith and belief seem to imply a resting, or a leaving. It is certain that the English belief is a compound of the prefix be and leaf, leave, permission. To believe one, then, is to leave with him, to rest or suffer to rest with him, and hence not to dispute, contend or deny.

Colour may be from spreading over or putting on; but in some instances the primary sense is to dip. See DYE and TINGE.

Spots are from the sense of separating or from sprinkling, dispersion.

The radical sense of making is to press, drive, or force. We use make in its true literal sense, in the phrases, Make your horse draw, Make your servant do what you wish.

Feeding is from the sense of pressing, crowding, stuffing, that is, from driving or thrusting. Eating seems to have a somewhat different sense.

Drinking is from drawing, or from wetting, plunging. Drench and drink are radically one word.

Anger, and the like violent passions, imply excitement, or violent action. Hence their connection with burning or inflammation, the usual sense of which is raging or violent commotion.

Agreement, harmony, are usually from meeting, or union, or from extending, reaching to.

Dwelling, abiding, are from the sense of throwing or setting down, or resting, or from stretching; as we see by the Latin continuo, from teneo, Gr. τεινω, to extend.

Guarding and defending are from roots that signify to stop, or to cut off; or more generally, from the sense of driving off, a repelling or striking back. In some cases perhaps from holding.

Opposition is usually expressed by meeting, and hence the prepositions which express opposition. Thus the Danish preposition mod, Swedish mot or emot, against, contrary, is the English word to meet.

Words which express spirit, denote, primarily, breath, air, wind, the radical sense of which is to flow, move or rush. Hence the connection, between spirit and courage, animus, animosus; hence passion, animosity. So in Greek φρενιτις, frenzy, is from φρην, the mind, or rather from its primary sense, a moving or rushing.

So in our mother tongue, mod is mind or spirit; whence mood, in English, and Saxon modig, moody, angry. Hence mind in the sense of purpose, its primary signification is a setting forward, as intention is from intendo, to stretch, to strain, the sense that ought to stand first in a Dictionary.

Reproach, chiding, rebuke, are from the sense of scolding, or throwing out words with violence.

Sin is generally from the sense of deviating, wandering, as is the practice of lewdness.

Right, justice, equity, are from the sense of stretching, making straight, or from laying, making smooth.

Falsehood is from falling, failing, or from deviation, wandering, drawing aside.

The primary sense of strange and foreign, is distant, and from some verb signifying to depart. Wild and fierce are from a like sense.

Vain, vanity, wane, and kindred words, are from exhausting, drawing out, or from departing, withdrawing, falling away.

Paleness is usually from failure, a departure of colour.

Glory is from opening, expanding, display, or making clear.

Binding, making fast or close, is from pressure, or straining.

Writing is from scratching, engraving, the sense of all primitive words which express this act.

A crowd, a mass, a wood, &c., are from collecting or pressing, or some allied signification.

Vapour, steam, smoke, are usually from verbs which signify to exhale or throw off.

Stepping seems to be from opening, expanding, stretching. Thus passus in Latin is from pando, to open, but this agrees in origin with pateo, and with the Greek πατεω. Gradus in Latin coincides with the Welsh rhawd, a way, and this, when traced to its root, terminates in the Oriental רדה, רד Chaldee, to open, stretch or expand; in Syriac, ܪܕܐ radah, to go, to pass. Walking may be sometimes from a like source; but the word walk signifies, primarily, to roll, press, work and full as a hat, whence walker signifies a fuller.

Softness and weakness are usually named from yielding, bending, withdrawing, as is relaxation. Softness, however, is sometimes connected with smoothness, and perhaps with moisture.

Sweetness seems to have for its primary sense, either softness or smoothness.

Roughness is from sharp points, wrinkling or breaking; and acidity is from sharpness or pungency, and nearly allied to roughness.

Death is expressed by falling or departure; life, by fixedness or continuance, or from animation, excitement.

Selling is, primarily, a passing or transfer. Sellan in Saxon, signifies to give, as well as to sell.

A coast or border is usually the extreme point, from extending.

Law is from setting, establishing.

The primary sense of son, daughter, offspring, is usually a shoot, or as we say, issue. Hence in Hebrew בן ben, signifies both a son, a scion, a branch, and the young of other animals. A son, says Parkhurst, is from בנה banah, to build; and hence he infers that a son is so called, because he builds up or continues his father's house or family. But if so, how does the word apply to a branch, or an arrow? What do these build up? The mistake of this author, and of others, proceeds from their not understanding the original meaning of the verb, which is not to erect, or elevate, but to throw, to set, to found; and this verb is probably retained in our word found. A son is that which is thrown or shot out; a scion or branch is the same, an offset, one an offset of the human body, the other of a plant, and an arrow is that which is shot or thrown. Hence, probably, the Hebrew אבן eben or even, a stone, W. maen or vaen, that which is set, so named from its compactness or hardness. And in Arabic أَبَنَ abana, signifies to think, Lat. opinor, that is, to set in the mind.

Few and small are senses often expressed by the same word. Thus, although few in English expresses merely a small number, yet the same word in French, peu, and in the Italian, poco, signifies little in quantity, as well as few in number.

Cause is from the sense of urging, pressing, impelling. Hence it well expresses that which produces an effect; and hence it is peculiarly expressive of that by which a man seeks to obtain a claim in law. A cause in court is properly a pressing for right, like action from ago; and prosecution from the Latin sequor, which is our word seek. Hence the Latin accuso, to accuse, to throw upon, to press or load with a charge. The Saxon saca, contention, suit in law, is synonymous with cause, and from the root of seek, sequor. It is the English sake.

The word thing is nearly synonymous with cause and sake. See THING in the Dictionary.

The primary sense of time, luck, chance, fortune, is to fall, to come, to arrive, to happen. Tide, time and season, have a like original sense. Tide, in Saxon, is time, not a flow of the sea, the latter being a secondary and modern application of the word. This primary signification of time will unfold to us why the Latin tempora should signify times and the temples. It seems that tempora are the falls of the head. Hence, also, we understand why tempest is naturally deducible from tempus, as the primary sense is to fall, to rush. Hence tempestivus, seasonable, that comes in good time. Season has a like sense.

Hence, also, we are led to understand, what has seemed inexplicable, how the French heureux, lucky, happy, can be regularly deduced from heure, an hour. We find that in Greek and Latin the primary sense of hour is time, and time is a coming, a falling, a happening, like the English luck, and hence the sense of lucky; hence fortunate and happy. The word fortunate is precisely of the same character.

The primary sense of the Shemitic דבר davar, or thavar, corresponds almost precisely with that of cause and thing in English, that is, to strain, urge, drive, fall or rush. Hence it signifies to speak, and in Ch. and Syr. to lead, to direct, to govern. As a noun, it signifies a word, that which is uttered; a thing, cause or matter, that is, that which happens or falls, like event from evenio; also a plague, or great calamity, that is, that which falls or comes on man or beast, like plague, a stroke or affliction, from striking. And it may be observed, that if the first letter is a prefix answering to the Gothic du, Saxon and English to, in the Saxon to-drifan, to drive, then the root בר coincides exactly with the Welsh peri, to command, which is retained in composition in the Lat. impero. Indeed if the first syllable of guberno is a prefix, the root of this word may be the same. The object, however, for which this word is here mentioned, is chiefly to show the uniformity which men have observed in expressing their ideas; making use of the same visible physical action to represent the operations of the mind and moral ideas.

Silence, deafness, dumbness, are from stopping, holding, or making fast.

War is from the sense of striving, driving, struggling.

Good is generally from enlarging, or advancing, like prosperous.

Evil is from wandering, departing, or sometimes from softness, weakness, flowing or flexibility, as is the case with the Latin malum, from the Welsh mall.

The primary sense of the names of natural and material objects cannot always be ascertained. The reasons are obvious. Some of these names are detached branches of a family of words which no longer form a part of our language; the verb and all the derivatives, except a single name, being extinct, or found only in some remote country. Others of these names have suffered such changes of orthography, that it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the primary or radical letters, and of course the family to which they belong. Numerous examples of such words occur in English, as in every other language.

But from such facts as have occurred to us in our researches, we may venture to affirm with confidence, that most names of natural objects are taken from some obvious quality or action, or some supposed quality of the thing; or from the particular action or operation by which it is produced. Thus tumours are named from pushing, or swelling; and redness, or red, seems, in some instances at least, to be named from eruptions on the body. The human body is named from shaping, that is, setting, fixing, or extending, and hence sometimes, the general name of the human race. The arm is a shoot, a push, as is the branch of a tree. A board, a table, a floor, is from spreading, or expanding, extending. Skin and bark are from peeling, stripping, &c.

The names of particular animals and plants cannot always be traced to their source; but as far as we have been able to discover their origin, we find animals to be generally named from some striking characteristic of external appearance, from the voice, from habits of life, or from their office. There is reason for believing that the Greek στρουθος and Latin struthio, or ostrich, is from the same root as the English strut, the strutter; the primary sense of which root is, to stretch, which explains all the senses of the Greek and Latin words of this family. It is certain that the crow is named from its cry, and the leopard from his spots.

Thus plants were named from their qualities: some from their form, others from their colour, others from their effects, others from the place of their growth. The English root, Lat. radix, is only a particular application of rod and ray, radius; that is, a shoot. Spurge is, undoubtedly, from the root of the Latin purgo.

There is reason to think that many names of plants were originally adjectives, expressing their qualities, or the name was a compound, used for the same purpose, one part of which has been dropped, and the other remaining as the name of the plant. Thus pine, pinus, is from pin, pinna, penna; for in Welsh pin is a pin and a pen or style for writing, and pinbren is a pine-tree. The tree then was named from its leaf.

Fir has a similar origin and signification.

It is probable or rather certain that some natural objects, as plants and minerals, received their names from their supposed qualities; as in ages of ignorance and superstition, men might ascribe effects to them, by mistake. The whole history of magic and enchantment leads us to this conclusion.

Minerals are, in many instances, named from their obvious qualities, as gold from its yellowness, and iron from its hardness. The names can, in some cases, be traced to their original, as that of gold and of the Latin ferrum; but many of them are not easily ascertained. Indeed, the greatest part of the specific names of animals, plants, and minerals, appear to be obscure. Some of them appear to have no connection with any family of words in our language, and many of them are derived to us from Asia, and from roots which can be found only, if found at all, in the Asiatic languages.

These observations and explanations will be sufficient to show the importance of developing, as far as possible, the origin of words, and of comparing the different uses of the same word in different languages, in order to understand either the philosophy of speech, or the real force and signification of words in their practical application.

If it should be found to be true, that many of the Shemitic verbs are formed with prefixes, like those of the European languages, this may lead to new illustrations of the original languages of the Scriptures. In order to determine this fact, it will be useful to examine whether the Chaldee and Hebrew ב is not often a prefix answering to be in the Teutonic languages; whether ג and כ are not prefixes answering to the ga and ge of the Gothic and Teutonic; whether ד, ט and ת, and ז, a dialectical form of ט, do not coincide with the Gothic du, the Saxon to, the Dutch toe, and the German zu; whether נ does not answer to the Russ. and Dutch na, the German nach; and whether ס and ש do not answer to s, sh, and sch in the modern English and German.

If many of the Shemitic triliteral verbs are compound, it follows that the primary radix has not been detected. At any rate, we have no hesitation in affirming that the primary sense of many of the roots in the Shemitic languages, that sense which is almost indispensable to an understanding of many obscure passages in the Scriptures, has been hitherto overlooked or mistaken. In order fully to comprehend many uses of the words, it will be necessary to compare them with the uses of the words of the same family in the modern languages, and this comparison must be far more extensive than any hitherto made, and conducted on principles which have not been before duly appreciated and applied.

We have introduced the foregoing comparative view of the several significations of the same word in different languages, not merely to illustrate the general principles of language, but with a special reference to an explanation of the etymologies which occur in this work.

The results of the foregoing remarks and illustrations may be thus recapitulated.

1. The nations which now constitute the distinct families or races of Japheth and Shem, are descendants of the common family which inhabited the plain of Shinar before the dispersion.

2. The families at the dispersion retained a large proportion of the words which were in common use before that event, and the same were conveyed to their posterity. In the course of time, some of these words were dropped by one family or tribe, and some by another, till very few of them are retained in their original form and signification, by all the nations which have sprung from the main stock. A few of them, however, are still found in all or nearly all the languages which we have examined, bearing nearly the same signification and easily recognized as identical.

3. Although few of the primitive words can now be recognized as existing in all the languages, yet as we better understand the changes which have been made in the orthography and signification of the same radical words, the more affinities are discovered; and particularly, when we understand the primary sense, we find this to unite words whose appropriate or customary significations appear to have no connection.

4. A great number of the primitive radical words are found in compounds, formed in different languages, with different affixes and prefixes, which obscure the affinity. Thus veritas in Latin, is wahrheit in German; the first syllable in each is the same word, the last different. In other instances, both difference of orthography, of formation and of application, concur to obscure the affinity of words. Thus, the English word strong is in Danish streng, signifying stern, severe, rigid, strict; and strenghed, [stronghood,] is severity, rigour, strictness. Now n in these words is not radical; remove this letter and we have strog, streg, which coincide with the Latin stringo, strictus; and these words are found to be from the same radix, which signifies to draw, to strain, to stretch.

5. It appears that b, p, and f are often prefixes, either the remains of prepositions, or casual additions to words, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, which prefixes now precede consonants, with which they readily coalesce in pronunciation, as l and r, forming triliteral words on biliteral roots; as in block from lloc, or lock; play, Saxon plegan, from leg or lek, Swedish leka, Dan. leger; flow, Lat. fluo, from lug, or luc, which appears in light, lux, luceo, and in lug, a river, retained in Lugdunum.

6. It appears also, that c or k and g, are often prefixes before the same consonants, l and r, as in Lat. clunis, Eng. loin; W. clod, praise, from llod, Latin laus, laudo; German gluck, English luck; Lat. gratia, W. rhad.

7. It appears also, that s is a prefix in a vast number of words, as in speed, spoil, swell, sweep; and it is very evident that st are prefixed to many words whose original, radical, initial consonant was r, as in straight, strict, strong, stretch, from the root of right, rectus, reach, and in stride, from the root of the Latin gradior, W. rhaz.

If these inferences are just, as we are persuaded they are, it follows that there is a more near resemblance and a much closer affinity between the languages of Europe and of Western Asia, than has hitherto been supposed to exist. It follows also, that some of the most important principles or rudiments of language have hitherto escaped observation, and that philology is yet in its infancy. Should this prove, on further examination, to be the state of philology, it is reserved for future investigators to examine the original languages of the Scriptures on new principles, which may serve to illustrate some obscure and difficult passages, not hitherto explained to the general satisfaction of critics and commentators.

Progress and Changes of the English Language.

It has been already observed that the mother tongue of the English is the Anglo-Saxon. The following are specimens of that language as it was spoken or written in England before the Norman conquest. The first is from the Saxon Chronicle. The original is in one column, and the literal translation in the other. The English words in italics are Saxon words. The number of these will show how large a proportion of the words is retained in the present English.

An. DCCCXCI. Her for se here east, and Earnulf cyning gefeaht with thæm ræde-here ær tha scipu comon, mid East-Francum, and Seaxum, and Bægerum, and hine geflymde. And thry Scottas cwomon to Ælfrede cyninge on anum bate, butan ælcum gerethum, of Hibernia; and thonon hi hi bestælon, forthon the hi woldon for Godes lufan on elthcodinesse bion, hy ne rohton hwær.	An. 891. Here [this year] fared the army east, and Earnulf, the king, fought with the cavalry [ride army] ere the ships come, with the East-Francs, and Saxons, and Bavarians, and put them to flight. And three Scots come to Ælfred, the king, in a [an] boat, without any rowers, from Hibernia, and thence they privately withdrew [bestole] because that they would, for God's love be [or live] in a state of pilgrimage, they should not be anxious—[reck, care] where.
Se bat wæs geworht of thriddan healfre hyde, the hic on foron, and hi namon mid him that hic hæfdon to seofon nihtum mete, and tha comon hic ymb seofon niht, to londe on Cornwealum, and foran tha sona to Ælfrede cyninge.	The boat was wrought of two hides and a half [third half hide,] in which they fared [came] and they took with them that they had for seven nights meat, and they come about the seventh night, to land in Cornwall, and fared [went] soon to Ælfred, the king.

The following specimen is from the Anglo-Saxon version of Orosius, supposed to be made by King Alfred.

We observe by these extracts that rather more than half the Saxon words have been lost, and now form no part of our language.

This language, with some words introduced by the Danes, continued to be used by the English till the Norman Conquest. After that event, great numbers of Saxon words went into disuse, not suddenly, but gradually, and French and Latin words were continually added to the language, till it began to assume its present form, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Yet the writings of Gower and Chaucer cannot now be fully understood without a glossary.

But it was not in the loss of native Saxon words and the accession of French and Latin words alone, that the change of our language consisted. Most important alterations were made in the sounds of the vowels. It is probable, if not certain, that our first vowel a had usually or always the broad sound, as we now pronounce it in fall, or in some words perhaps the Italian sound, as it is now called, and as we pronounce it in ask. The sound of e was probably nearly the same as it is in French and Italian, and in the northern languages on the continent of Europe; which is nearly that of a in favour. The Saxon sound of i was probably the same as it is still on the Continent, the sound of ee or long e. The sound of u was that of our present oo, French ou, the sound it still has in Italian, and in most countries on the European continent. It is probable that the change of the sound of u happened in consequence of the prevalence of the French pronunciation after the Conquest; for the present sound of u may be considered as intermediate, between the full sound of oo, or French ou, and the French sound of u.

These changes, and the various sounds given to the same character, now serve to perplex foreigners, when learning English; and tend, in no small degree, to retard or limit the extension of our language. This is an unfortunate circumstance, not only in obstructing the progress of science, but of Christianity.

The principal changes in the articulations are the use of k for c, as in look for locian; the loss of h before l, as in loaf from hlaf, lot for hlot, lean for hlinian; and the entire loss of the prefix ge or ga, as in deal for ge-dælan, deem for ge-deman; and of to as a prefix, as in to-helpan, to help; to-dailan, to deal. In no instance do we feel more sensibly the change of sounds in the vowels, than in that of i, which in French, Spanish, and Italian, is e long; for in consequence of this, persons who are not acquainted with these foreign languages, mispronounce such words as marino, Messina, Lima, giving to i its English sound, when in fact the words are to be pronounced mareeno, Messeena, Leema.

In grammatical structure the language has suffered considerable alterations. In our mother tongue, nouns were varied to form cases, somewhat as in Latin. This declension of nouns has entirely ceased, except in the possessive or genitive case, in which an apostrophe before s has been substituted for the regular Saxon termination es. Some of our pronouns retain their declensions, somewhat varied. The plural termination in en has been dropped, in a number of words, and the regular plural termination been substituted, as houses for housen.

In most cases, the Saxon termination of the infinitive mode of verbs has been dropped, and for gifan we now write, to give. The variations of the verb, in the several persons, have been materially changed. Thus for the Saxon—

Ic lufige,	We lufiath,
Thu lufast,	Ge lufiath,
He lufath.	Hi lufiath.

we now write—

I love,	We love,
Thou lovest,	Ye love,
He loveth or loves.	They love.

In the Saxon plural, however, we see the origin of the vulgar practice, still retained in some parts of England. We loves, they loves, which are contractions of lufiath.

In the substantive verb, our common people universally, and most persons of better education, unless they have rejected their traditionary language, retain the Gothic dialect, in the past tense.

I was,	We was,
Thou wast,	Ye was,
He was.	They was.

However people may be ridiculed for this language, it is of genuine origin, as old as the Saxon word were. In Gothic the past tense runs thus —

Ik was,	Weis wesum,
Thu wast,	Yus wesuth,
Is was.	Eis wesun.*

In the present tense of the substantive verb. our common people use a'nt, as in this phrase: "he a'nt present." This is evidently a contraction of the Swedish and Danish är, er, present indicative singular of the substantive verb vara or værer, to be, which we retain in are and were. In Swedish, han är, and in Danish, han er, he is. Hence he er not or ar not, contracted into he a'nt or e'nt.

These facts serve to show how far the Gothic dialect has been infused into the English language.

It would be tedious, and to most readers uninteresting, to recite all the changes in the forms of words or the structure of sentences which have taken place since the Norman conquest. Since the invention of printing, changes in the language have been less rapid than before; but no art nor effort can completely arrest alterations in a living language. The distinguished writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth improved the language, but could not give it stability. Many words then in common use are now obsolete, or have suffered a change of signification. In the period between Queen Elizabeth and the beginning of the eighteenth century, the language was improved in grammar, orthography, and style. The writers in the reign of Queen Anne and of George I. brought the language nearly to perfection; and if any improvement has since been made, it is in the style or diction, by a better selection of words, and the use of terms in science and philosophy with more precision.

In regard to grammatical construction, the language, for half a century past, has, in our apprehension, been suffering deterioration, at least as far as regards its written form. This change may be attributed chiefly to the influence of the learned Bishop Lowth, whose Grammar made its appearance nearly seventy years ago. We refer particularly to his form of the verb, which was adjusted to the practice of writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth, instead of the practice of authors in the age of William and Mary, Queen Anne, and George I. Hence he gives for the form of the verb in the subjunctive mood, after the words which express a condition, if, though, &c. I love, thou love, he love, observing in a note that in the subjunctive mood, the event being spoken of under a condition or supposition, or in the form of a wish, and therefore doubtful and contingent, the verb itself in the present, and the auxiliary both of the present and past imperfect times, often carry with them somewhat of a future sense; as, "If he come to-morrow, I may speak to him"—"If he should come, I should speak to him." This is true; but for that very reason, this form of the verb belongs to the future tense, or should be arranged as such in Grammars. If he come, would be in Latin si venerit, in the subjunctive future.

But the learned author has entirely overlooked the important distinction between an event or fact, of uncertain existence in the present time, and which is mentioned under the condition of present existence, and a future contingent event. "If the mail that has arrived contains a letter for me, I shall soon receive it," is a phrase that refers to the present time, and expresses an uncertainty in my mind, respecting the fact. "If the mail contain a letter for me," refers to a future time, that is, "If the mail of to-morrow contain [shall or should contain] a letter for me." The first event, conditional or hypothetical, should be expressed by the indicative mood, and the latter by the subjunctive future. The Saxon form of the verb, if he slay, if he go, is evidently a contingent future, and is so used in the laws.

This distinction, one of the most important in the language, has been so totally overlooked, that no provision has been made for it in English Grammars: nor is the distinction expressed by the form of the verb, as used by a great part of the best writers. On the other hand they continually use one form of the verb to express both senses. The fact is the same in the common version of the Scriptures. If he go, if he speak, sometimes express a present conditional tense, and sometimes a contingent future. In general this subjunctive form of the verb in Scripture, expresses future time. "If he thus say, I have no delight in thee," expresses a future contingent event; 2 Sam. xv. 26. "If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away," expresses a fact, under a condition, in the present time; Job xi. 14.

In many instances the translators have deviated from the original, in using the subjunctive form of the English verb to express what in Greek is expressed in the indicative. Thus Matthew iv. 6. Ει υίος ει του Θεου, If thou be [art] the son of God.

Ch. v. 29 and 30. Ει δε ὁ οφθαλμος σου ὁ δεξιος σκανδαλιζει σε, If thy right eye offend [offendeth thee; Ει ἡ δεξια σου χειρ σκανδαλιζει σε, If thy right hand offend [offendeth] thee.

So also in chapter xviii. 8 and 9.

Ch. xii. 26. Ει ο Σατανας τον Σαταναν εκβαλλει, If Satan cast [casteth] out Satan.

Ch. xix. 10. Ει οὑτως εστιν ἡ αιτια του ανθρωπου μετα της γυναικος, If the case of the man be [is] so with his wife.

Ch. xxii. 45. Ει ουν Δαβιδ καλει αυτον Κυριον, If David then call [calleth] him Lord.

2 Cor. iv. 16. Ει ο εξω ἡμων ανθρωπος διαφθειρεται, Though our outward man perish [perishes, or is perishing.]

In all these passages, the English verb, in the subjunctive, properly expresses a conditional, contingent or hypothetical future tense, contrary to the sense of the original, except in the last passage cited, where the apostle evidently speaks of the perishing of the outward man as a fact admitted, which renders the translation still more improper.

Let us now attend to the following passages.

Matthew vii. 9. Η τις εστιν εξ ὑμων ανθρωπος, ον εαν αιτηση ο υἱος αυτου αρτον. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask [shall ask] bread, will he give him a stone?

Και εαν ιχθυν αιτηση, If he ask [shall ask] a fish, will he give him a serpent?

Here the original tense is varied to express a future or hypothetical event, yet the verb in English is in the same tense as in the first class of examples; and what renders the version more objectionable is, that the verb in the first clause does not correspond with that in the second clause. There is no possible way of making good English of the translation, but by supposing the verb in the first clause ask, to be in the future tense. So it would be in Latin, and so it is, "si petierit." If thy son shall ask (or should ask) a fish, will he give (or would he give) him a serpent?

This fault runs through the whole English version of the Scriptures, and a distinction of tenses clearly marked in the original languages, is generally neglected in the translation.

1 Tim. v. 4. Ει δε τις χηρα τεκνα η εκγονα εχει, If any widow have [has] children or nephews.

Verse 8. Ει δε τις των ιδιων και μαλιστα των οικειων ου προνοει, If any provide [provideth] not for his own, and especially for those of his own house.

This subjunctive form of the verb, if he be; if he have; if he go; if he say; if thou write; whether thou see; though he fall, which was generally used by the writers of the sixteenth century, was in a great measure discarded before the time of Addison. Whether this change was in consequence of the prevalence of colloquial usage over grammar rules, or because discerning men perceived the impropriety and inconsistency of the language of books, I pretend not to determine. Certain it is, that Locke, Watts, Addison, Pope, and other authors of the first distinction, who adorned the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, generally used the indicative mood to express condition, uncertainty, and hypothesis in the present and past tenses. Thus Locke writes —"If these two prepositions are by nature imprinted." "If principles are innate." "If any person hath never examined this notion." "Whether that substance thinks or no." "If the soul doth think in sleep." "If one considers well these men's way of speaking." "If he does not reflect." "Unless

* This is probably the Latin esse. The Latins dropped the first articulation v, which answers to our w.

The present tense, indicative mood, of the Latin verb, with the v restored, would be written thus—

Ego vesum,	Nos vesumus, [was,]
Tu ves,	Vos vestis, [was,]
Ille vest.	Illi vesunt, [was.]

that notion produces a constant train of successive ideas." "If your lordship means." Such is the language of Locke.

Now, what is remarkable, the learned Dr. Lowth, the very author who has, by his Grammar, done much to sanction the subjunctive form of the verb, in such cases, often uses the indicative in his own writings. "If he does not carefully attend to this—if this pleasure arises from the shape of the composition—if this is not firmly and well established." These verbs are in contradiction of his own principles.

On Isaiah. Prelim. Diss.

Addison. "If the reader has a mind to see a father of the same stamp." "If exercise throws off all superfluities—if it clears the vessels—if it dissipates a growing distemper." Such is the language of Addison, the most elegant writer of the genuine English idiom in the nation.

"If the thief is poor—if it obliges me to be conversant with scenes of wretchedness." Wilberforce.

"If America is not to be conquered." Lord Chatham.

"If we are to be satisfied with assertions." "If it gives blind confidence to any executive government." "If such an opinion has gone forth." "If our conduct has been marked with vigour and wisdom." Fox.

"If my bodily strength is equal to the task." "A negro, if he works for himself and not for a master, will do double the work." "If there is any aggravation of our guilt." "If their conduct displays no true wisdom." "The honourable gentleman may, if he chooses, have the journals read again." "Whether this is a sufficient tie to unite them." "If this measure comes recommended." "If there exists a country which contains the means of protection." Pitt.

"If the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence." "If an assembly is viciously or feebly composed." "If any persons are to make good deficiencies." "If the King of the French has really deserved these murderous attempts." "If this representation of M. Necker was false." "Whether the system, if it deserves the name." "The politician looks for a power that our workmen call a purchase, and if he finds the power." "If he feels as men commonly feel." Burke.

"If climate has such an effect on mankind." "If the effects of climate are casual." Coxe's Russ.

"If he finds his collection too small." "If he thinks his judgment not sufficiently enlightened." "Whether it leads to truth." "If he warns others against his own failings." This is generally the language of Johnson.

In regard to this distinguished author, we would observe that, except the substantive verb, there is in his Rambler but a single instance of the subjunctive form of the verb in conditional sentences. In all other cases the use of the indicative is uniform.

But neither the authors here mentioned, nor most others, even the most distinguished for erudition, are uniform and consistent with themselves in the use of the tenses. In one sentence we find the indicative used, "If it is to be discovered only by the experiment." "If other indications are to be found." In the next sentence, "If to miscarry in an attempt be a proof of having mistaken the direction of genius." Johnson.

"If the former be refined—if those virtues are accompanied with equal abilities." Gibbon.

"If love reward him, or if vengeance strike." Cowper.

"Or if it does not brand him to the last." Ib.

"If he is a pagan—if endeavours are used—if the person hath a liberal education—if man be subject to these miseries." Milner.

The following expressions occur in Pope's Preface to Homer's Iliad, in the compass of thirteen lines.

"If he has given a regular catalogue of an army."
"If he has funeral games for Patroclus."
"If Ulysses visit the shades."
"If he be detained from his return."
"If Achilles be absent."
"If he gives his hero a suit of celestial armour."

We recollect one English author only, who has been careful to avoid this inconsistency; this is Gregory, who, in his Economy of Nature, has uniformly used the indicative form of the verb in conditional sentences of this kind.

The propriety of using the indicative form of the verb to express a present or past event conditionally, does not rest solely on usage; it is most correct upon principle. It is well known that most of the words which are used to introduce a condition or hypothesis, and called, most improperly, conjunctions, are verbs, having not the least affinity to the class of words used to connect sentences. If is the Saxon gif, give, having lost its first letter; if for the ancient gif. Though is also a verb now obsolete, except in the imperative mood. Now let us analyze this conditional tense of the verb. "If the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel." Here is an omission of the word that after if. The true original phrase was, "If that the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel"—that is, give that [admit the fact which is expressed in the following clause,] the man knows his true interest, then the consequence follows, he will avoid a quarrel. That in this sentence is a relative or demonstrative substitute for the following clause. This will more plainly appear by transposing the clauses. "The man knows his true interest; give that [admit that;] he will then avoid a quarrel." Now let the subjunctive form be used. "The man know his true interest; give that; he will avoid a quarrel."

Here the impropriety of this form of the verb appears in a strong light. It will appear more clearly by the use of other words of equivalent signification. Grant the man know his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel. Allow the man know his true interest. Suppose the man know his true interest. We never use the subjunctive form after the three last verbs which introduce the condition. Though is sometimes followed by the indicative; sometimes by the subjunctive; but it ought always to be followed by the indicative, for it supposes the fact to be given; and so does admit, when used in hypothetical sentences. Admit that the man knows his interest. We have then decisive proof that the use of the indicative form of the verb after if, when it expresses a conditional event in present time, is most correct; indeed, it is the only correct form. This remark is equally applicable to the past tense conditional.

The language of Addison, Johnson, and other distinguished writers of the last century, in the use of the indicative, is therefore more correct than the language of the writers in the age of Elizabeth.

We consider that general and respectable usage in speaking is the genuine or legitimate language of a country, to which the written language ought to be conformed. Language is that which is uttered by the tongue, and if men do not write the language as it is spoken by the great body of respectable people, they do not write the real language. Now, in colloquial usage, the subjunctive form of the verb, in conditional sentences, is rarely used, and perhaps never, except when the substantive verb is employed. Our students are taught in school the subjunctive form, if thou have, if he come, &c., and some of them continue, in after life, to write in that manner; but in the course of more than forty years, we have not known three men who have ventured to use that form of the verb in conversation. We toil in school to learn a language which we dare not introduce into conversation, but which the force of custom compels us to abandon. In this respect, the present study of grammar is worse than useless.

This colloquial custom accords with other languages. The French say and write s'il est, if he is. The Latins often used the same form, "si quid est in me ingenii, judices;" but the use of the Latin subjunctive depends on certain other words which precede; as "cum sit civis," as he is a citizen, or since he is a citizen; and the present tense is often used to express what we express by an auxiliary. That the Greeks used the indicative to express a conditional present tense, we have seen by citations above.

By this arrangement of the verb, the indicative form after if and other verbs introducing a condition or hypothesis, may be used uniformly to express a fact or event under a condition or supposition, either in the present or past tenses; the speaker being uncertain respecting the fact, or representing it as doubtful.

"If the man is honest, he will return what he has borrowed." "If the ship has arrived, we shall be informed of it to-morrow." "If the bill was presented, it was doubtless paid." "If the law has been passed, we are precluded from further opposition."

On the other hand, when it is intended to speak of a future contingent event, we would always use the auxiliaries that are proper for the purpose. "If it shall or should rain to-morrow, we shall not ride to town." We would never use the subjunctive form, if it rain, in prose; and in poetry, only from necessity, as an abridged phrase, for if it shall or should rain. In this manner the distinction between the tenses, which are now constantly confounded, may be preserved and made obvious, both to natives and foreigners.

The effect of the study of Lowth's principles, which has been greatly extended by the popularity of Murray's Grammar,* has been to introduce or establish a form of the verb in writing, which is obsolete in colloquial language; to fill our books with a confusion of tenses, and thus to keep the language unsettled. Nothing can be more perplexing to the student, than every where to meet with discrepancies between rules and practice.

There is another erroneous manner of writing, common to the best authors in the language, which seems to have escaped notice. This is, to connect a verb in the past tense with a preceding one in the same tense, when the latter verb is intended to express a very different time from the former. Thus, "Then Manasseh knew that the Lord, he was God;" 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13.

The Latins, in this case, would probably have used the infinitive; "Manasseh novit Jehovam Deum esse." In English we ought to write and say, "Manasseh knew Jehovah to be God," or, "Manasseh knew that Jehovah he is God." In most similar cases the use of the infinitive in English is as elegant as in Latin. But there are many cases where the infinitive cannot be used. We cannot use it after say; "he said him to be a good man," is not English; though "he declared, or affirmed, or believed him to be a good man," is elegant.

In order to understand the impropriety of the common mode of using the latter verb, as in the example above cited, it may be remarked, that the present tense is that which is used to express what exists at all times. Thus we say, God is or exists, whenever we speak of his permanent existence; we say, Gold is yellow or ductile; iron is a most valuable metal, it is not convertible into silver; plants and animals are very distinct living beings. We do not say, Gold was yellow; iron was a valuable metal; for we mean to express permanent qualities. Hence, in the passage cited from Chronicles, the first verb knew, referring to a fact past, is correct; but the last, which is intended to express the permanent being or character of God, should be in the infinitive or the indicative present tense. The following are examples of correct language: "His master had taught him that happiness consists in virtue." Anacharsis, ii. 120

"Sabellius, who openly taught that there is but one person in the Godhead." Encyclopedia.

"Our Saviour taught that eternal death is the proper punishment of sin." Emmons.

But very different is the following: "Having believed for many years, that water was [is] an elastic fluid." The following would be still better: "Having believed water to be an elastic fluid."

So the following: "We know not the use of the epidermis of shells. Some authors have supposed that it secured [secures] the shells from being covered with vermes." Edin. Encyc.

"It was just remarked, that marine fossils did not [do not] comprise vegetable remains." Ib.

"If my readers will turn their thoughts back on their old friends, they will find it difficult to call a single man to remembrance who appeared to know that life was short [is short,] till he was about to lose it." Rambler, No. 71.

"They considered the body as a hydraulic machine, and the fluids as passing through a series of chemical changes; forgetting that animation was [is] its essential characteristic." Darwin.

"It was declared by Pompey, that if the Commonwealth was [should be] violated, he could stamp with his foot and raise an army out of the ground." Rambler, No. 10.

In the foregoing sentence, the past tense is used for the future contingent.

"It was affirmed in the last discourse, that much of the honourable practice of the world rested [rests] on the substratum of selfishness; that society was [is] held together, in the exercise of its relative virtues, mainly by the tie of reciprocal advantage; that a man's own interest bound [binds] him to all those average equities which obtained [obtain] in the neighbourhood around him; and in which if he proved [should prove] himself glaringly deficient, he would be abandoned by the respect, and the confidence, and the good will of the people with whom he had [might have, or should have] to do." Chalmer's Com. Dis. 4.

"In the last discourse, I observed that love constituted [constitutes] the whole moral character of God." Dwight's Theology.

"And he said, Nay, father Abraham; but if one went [shall or should go] to them from the dead, they will repent. And he said to him, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose [shall or should rise] from the dead;" Luke xvi. 30, 31.

"Cicero vindicated the truth, and inculcated the value of the precept, that nothing was [is] truly useful which was [is] not honest."

"He undertook to show that justice was [is] of perpetual obligation."

"The author concedes much of his argument, and admits that the sea was [is] susceptible of dominion." [Better still; he admits the sea to be susceptible of dominion.]

"A nation would be condemned by the impartial voice of mankind, if it voluntarily went [should go] to war, on a claim of which it doubted [should doubt] the legality."

"He held that the law of nations prohibited [prohibits] the use of poisoned arms."

"He insisted that the laws of war gave [give] no other power over a captive than to keep him safely."

"The general principle on the subject is, that, if a commander makes a compact with the enemy, and it be of such a nature that the power to make it could be reasonably implied from the nature of the trust, it would be valid and binding, though he abused his trust." Let any man translate this sentence into another language, if he can, without reducing the verbs to some consistency.

"From his past designs and administrations, we could never argue at all to those which were future." [This is an odd combination of words.]

"Jesus knowing that the father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and went to God;" John xiii. 3.

"Alexander dispatched Eumenes with three hundred horse to two free cities—with assurance that if they submitted and received him [should or would submit and receive] as a friend, no evil should befall them."

"The apostle knew that the present season was [is] the only time allowed for this preparation."

"What would be the real effect of that overpowering evidence which our adversaries required [should require] in a revelation, it is difficult to foretell."

"It could not otherwise have been known that the word had [has] this meaning."

"I told him if he went [should go] to-morrow, I would go with him."

This fault occurs in our hearing every hour in the day.

A like fault prevails in other languages; indeed the English may have been led into it by reading foreign authors. "Mais on a remarqué avec raison, que l'espace conchoidal était infini." Lunier. It has been remarked with reason, that the conchoidal space was [is] infinite.

But whatever may be the practice of other nations, there would be no difficulty in correcting such improprieties in our own language, if as much attention were given to the study of its true principles, as is given to other subjects of literature and science. But if in this particular, there is an English author who writes his vernacular language correctly, his writings have not fallen under our inspection.

* Lindley Murray, in the Introduction to his Grammar, acknowledges, in general terms, that "the authors to whom the grammatical part of this compilation is principally indebted for its materials are, Harris, Johnson, Lowth, Priestley, Beattie, Sheridan, Walker, and Coote." But on examination it appears that the greatest portion of the grammatical part is from Lowth, whose principles form the main structure of Murray's compilation. Some valuable notes and remarks are taken from Priestley's Grammar.

There is another fault very common among English writers, this is the conversion of an intransitive verb into a passive one. It is surprising that an error of this kind should have gained such an established use, in some foreign languages, as to be incurable. Barbarous nations may indeed form languages; but it should be the business of civilized men to purify their language from barbarisms.

In the transitive verb, there is an agent that performs some action on an object, or in some way affects it. When this verb becomes passive, the agent and the object change places in the sentence. Thus, John loves Peter, is transitive, but Peter is loved by John, is passive. In the intransitive verb the case is different; for the action is limited to the agent; and when it is stated that a thing is done, there is no agent by which it is done. I perish, is intransitive; I am perished, is the passive form; but the latter neither expresses nor implies an agent by which I perish.

This fault occurs frequently in the common version of the Scriptures.

"Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was [had] perished." Job xxx. 2.

"Their memorial is [has] perished with them." Ps. ix. 6.

"The heathen are [have] perished out of this land." Ps. x. 16.

"Israel is [has] fled before the Philistines." 1 Sam. iv. 17.

"David is [has] fled." 2 Sam. xix. 9.

"The days were [had] not expired." 1 Sam. xviii. 26.

"And when the year was [had] expired." 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10.

"I only am [have] escaped alone to tell thee." Job i. 15.

"And it came to pass, when he was [had] returned." Luke xix. 15.

Return is sometimes a transitive verb, and sometimes intransitive. When a sum of borrowed money is returned, the phrase is correct, for this is the passive form of a transitive verb. But when a man is returned, we may ask, who has returned him? In this case, the man returns by his own act, and he cannot be said to be returned.

"He found the Empress was [had] departed." Coxe.

"They were [had] arrived within three days' journey of the spice country." Gibbon, Ch. i. Note.

"Neither Charles nor Diocletian were [had] arrived at a very advanced period of life." Ib. Ch. xiii.

"The posterity of so many gods and heroes was [had] fallen into the most abject state." Ib. Ch. ii.

"Silver was [had] grown more common." Ib.

"He was [had] risen from the dead, and was [had] just ascended to heaven." Milner, i 20.

"Hearing that they were [had] arrived." Ib. 211.

"Claudius—vexed because his wife was [had] become a Christian." Ib. 274.

"Does not the reader see how much we are [have] already departed from Christian simplicity?" Ib. 299.

"My age is [has] departed." Isaiah xxxviii. 12.

"The man out of whom the demons were [had] departed." Luke viii. 35.

"Workmen were [had] arrived to assist them." Milford.

"A body of Athenian horse was [had] just arrived." Ib.

This fault is common in Mitford's History of Greece. In the writings of Roscoe, which are more elegant, it occurs, but less frequently.

"The time limited for the reception of the cardinal was expired." Roscoe, Leo. X.

"He inquired whether the report was true, that a legate was arrived." Ib. L. Med.

"The nation being [having] once more got into a course of borrowing." Price on Liberty.

"When he was [had] retired to his tent." Coxe's Russ.

"He was [had] not yet arrived."* Ib.

The intransitive verb grow is constantly used as a transitive verb, as, to grow wheat.

It seems almost incredible that such errors should continue, to this time, to disfigure the language of the most distinguished writers, and that they should escape animadversion. The practice has evidently been borrowed from the French or Italian; but surely no lover of correctness can excuse such violation of the best established principles in our language.

There is a grammatical error running through the writings of so respectable a writer as Mitford, which ought not to be passed unnoticed; as it seems to be borrowed from the French language, whose idioms are different from the English, but which the English are too apt to follow. This fault is, in using the preterite or perfect tense, instead of the past tense indefinite, usually called, most improperly, the imperfect. Take the following sentences for examples. "The conduct of Pelopidas toward Arcadia and its minister at the Persian court —has scarcely been the result of mere caprice or resentment." The verb here ought to be was.

"The oration [of Isocrates] has been [was] a favourite of Dionysius of Halicarnassus."

This form of expressing the time would be good in French, but is very bad in English. And it may be here remarked, that the tense he was, he arrived, he wrote, is not properly named imperfect. These verbs, and all verbs of this form, denote actions finished or perfect, as "In six days God created the heaven and the earth." Imperfect or unfinished action is expressed in English in this manner, he was reading, they were writing. The error of calling the former tense imperfect, has probably proceeded from a servile adoption of the Latin names of the tenses, without considering the difference of application.

There are some errors in all the English Grammars, that have been derived to us from antiquity. Such is the arrangement of that among the conjunctions, like the Greek οτι, and the Latin ut. Και μακαρια ἡ πιστευσασα, οτι εσται τελειωσις τοις λελαλημενοις αυτῃ παρα Κυριου. And blessed is she who believed that there shall be a performance of the things which were told her from the Lord; Luke i. 45. In our version, οτι is rendered for, but most erroneously. The true meaning and character of οτι will best appear, by a transposition of the clauses of the verse: "There shall be a performance of the things told her from the Lord; blessed or happy is she who believed that." Here οτι, that, appears to be what it really is, a relative or substitute for the whole clause in Greek succeeding it. So in Luke xxii. 18. Λεγω γαρ ὑμιν οτι ου μη πιω, &c. I say to you that I will not drink. I will not drink, I say to you that. It is the same in Latin, "Dico enim vobis quod non bibam." Quod is here a relative governed by dico, and referring to the following clause of the sentence.

So also Matthew ix. 28. Πιστευετε οτι δυναμαι τουτο ποιησαι; Do ye believe that I am able to do this? I am able to do this, do ye believe that?

This error runs through all Grammars, Greek, Latin, French, English, &c. But how such an obvious fact, that the word that and its corresponding words in other languages, refer to the clause of a sentence, should escape observation, age after age, it is not easy to explain. How could it be supposed that a word is a conjunction which does not join words or sentences? That is used, in the passages cited, not to unite two sentences, but to continue the same sentence by an additional clause.

The relative, when referring to a sentence or the clause of a sentence, is not varied, for a variation of case is not wanted.

So notwithstanding and provided in English, and pourvu que in French, are called conjunctions, but most improperly; as they are participles, and when called conjunctions, they always form, with a word, clause or sentence, the case absolute or independent. Thus, "It rains, but notwithstanding that, [it rains,] I must go to town." That fact (it rains) not opposing or preventing me, that is, in opposition to that, I must go to town; hoc non obstante.

"I will ride, provided you will accompany me." That is, I will ride, the fact, you will accompany me, being provided.

Such is the structure of these sentences. It is the same in French, pourvu que, that being provided, que referring to the following clause.

There are other points in grammar equally faulty. Not only in English grammar, but in the grammars of other languages, men stumble at the threshold, and teach their children to stumble. In no language whatever can there be a part of speech properly called an article. There is no word or class of words that falls within the signification of article, a joint, or that can otherwise than arbitrarily be brought under that denomination. The definitive words called articles, are all adjectives or pronouns. When they are used with nouns, they are adjectives, modifying the signification of the nouns, like other adjectives; for this is their proper office. When they stand alone, they are pronouns, or substitutes for nouns. Thus hic, ille, ipse, in Latin, when used with nouns expressed, are adjectives; hic homo, this man; ille homo, that man. When they stand alone, hic, ille, they stand in the place of nouns. The fact is the same in other languages.

* On this use of intransitive verbs, as the ship was departed, it may be asked, who departed it? The mail is arrived, who has arrived it? The tree is perished, who has perished it? The enemy was fled, who fled them? The time was expired, who expired it?

The English the is an adjective, which, for distinction, we call a definitive adjective, and for brevity, a definitive, as it defines the person or thing to which it refers, or rather designates a particular person or thing. But why this should be selected as the only definitive in our language, is very strange; when obviously this and that are more exactly definitive, designating more precisely a particular person or thing than the. These words answer to the Latin hic and ille, which were always used by the Romans, when they had occasion to specify definite persons or things.

As to the English an or a, which is called in grammars the indefinite article, there are two great mistakes. A being considered as the original word, it is said to become an before a vowel. The fact is directly the reverse. An is the original word, and this is contracted to a by dropping the n before a consonant.

But an is merely the Saxon orthography of one, un, unus, an adjective found in nearly all the languages of Europe, and expressing a single person or thing. It is merely a word of number, and no more an article than two, three, four, and every other number in the language. Take the following examples.

Bring me an orange from the basket; that is, any one of the number.

Bring me two oranges from the basket; that is, any two of the number.

Bring me three oranges from the basket; that is, any three of the number; and so on to any number ad infinitum.

When thus used, an, two, three, are all indefinite; that is, they are used with nouns which are indefinite, or expressing things not particularly designated. But this is not owing to the essential character of the adjectives, an, one, two, three; for any of them may be used with definite nouns; and an is continually thus used.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries."

"The angel stood for an adversary against Balaam."

"Make this fellow return, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us."

"Rezon ... was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon."

"And he spake a parable to them to this end."

"And there was a widow in that city."

"And seeing the multitude, he went up into a mountain."

"I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee."

"Thou art a God ready to pardon."

Now let any of these phrases be tested by the common definition of an or a, "that it is used in a vague sense, to point out one single thing of the kind; in other respects indeterminate." Lowth.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries;" that is, "I will be any adversary," one of the kind, but vague or indeterminate.

"Rezon was an adversary to Israel;" that is, in a vague sense any adversary, indeterminate.

"And he spake a parable to them;" that is, any parable, indeterminate.

"Thou art a God ready to pardon;" that is, any God, one of the kind, in a vague sense, indeterminate!

If it should be said, the noun is rendered determinate, by other words in the sentence, and not by an or a, this may be and generally is true; but this shows that an does not give to the noun its character of definiteness or indefiniteness; it always retains its proper signification, which is one, and nothing more; and it is used indifferently before nouns definite or indefinite.

This mistake of the character of an is found in other languages.

ORTHOGRAPHY.

From the period of the first Saxon writings, our language has been suffering changes in orthography. The first writers, having no guide but the ear, followed each his own judgment or fancy; and hence a great portion of Saxon words are written with different letters, by different authors; most of them are written two or three different ways, and some of them fifteen or twenty. To this day the orthography of some classes of words is not entirely settled; and in others it is settled in a manner to confound the learner, and mislead him into a false pronunciation. Nothing can be more disreputable to the literary character of a nation, than the history of English orthography, unless it is that of orthoepy.

1. The Saxon diphthong æ, which probably had a specific and uniform sound or combination of sounds, has been discarded and ea generally substituted in its place, as bræth, breath. Now ea thus united have not a uniform sound, and of course they are no certain guide to pronunciation. In some instances, where the Saxon spelling was not uniform, the modern orthography follows the most anomalous and difficult, instead of that which is regular. Thus the Saxons wrote fether and fether, more generally the latter, and the moderns write feather.

2. The letter g in Saxon words, has, in many English words, been sunk in pronunciation, and either wholly lost, or it is now represented by y or w. Thus dæg, or dag, has become day; gear is year, bugan is bow, and fæger is fair.

3. The Saxons, who adopted the Roman alphabet, with a few alterations, used c with its close sound like that of k. Thus lic, like; locian, to look. But after the Norman conquest, c before e, i, and y, took the sound of s: hence arose the necessity of changing this letter in words and syllables, where it was necessary to retain the sound of k before these vowels. Thus the Saxon licean, pronounced originally likean, becomes, with our present sound of c before e, lisean; and locian becomes losian. To remedy this evil, our ancestors introduced k from the Greek, writing it generally after c, as in lick, stick, though in some instances, omitting c, as in like and look. Hence in all monosyllables in which a syllable beginning with e or i is added to the word, as in the past time and participles of verbs, we use k in the place of the Saxon c, as in licked, licking.

Our early writers attempted to extend this addition to words introduced from the Latin and Greek, in which no such reason exists for the use of k. Thus they wrote publick, musick, rhetorick. In these and similar words the Latins used c for the Greek κ, as musicus, for μουσικος, and the early English writers took both letters, the Roman c and Greek κ. This was absurd enough; but they never proceeded so far as to carry the absurdity through the derivatives; never writing publickation, musickal, rhetorickal, catholickism, skeptickism, stoickism. After a long struggle with the force of authority, good sense has nearly banished this pedantic orthography from use; and all words of this kind now appear, in most of our public acts and elegant writings, in their proper simplicity; public, publication, music, musical.

4. In many words, formerly ending in ie, these letters have been discarded from the singular number, and y substituted. Thus remedie, memorie, are now written remedy, memory. But what is very singular, the plural of these words retains the ie, with the addition of s, as in remedies. This anomaly, however, creates no great inconvenience, except that it has been extended by negligent writers to words ending in ey, as in attornies. But words ending in ey properly make the plural by simply taking s, as in surveys, attorneys. The same rule applies to verbs when an s is added, as in conveys.

require the omission of e final in motive, pensive, juvenile, genuine, sanguine, doctrine, examine, determine, and a multitude of others. The introduction of e, in most words of these classes, was at first wrong, as it could not plead any authority in the originals; but the retaining of it is unjustifiable, as the letter is not merely useless, but, in very numerous classes of words, it leads to a false pronunciation. Many of the most respectable English authors, a century ago or more, omitted e in such words as examin, determin, famin, ductil, fertil, definit, &c., but these improvements were afterwards rejected, to the great injury of orthography. In like manner, a final e is inserted in words of modern coinage, as in alumine, chlorine, chloride, oxide, &c., without the least necessity or propriety.

6. A similar fate has attended the attempt to anglicize the orthography of another class of words, which we have received from the French. At a very early period, the words chambre, desastre, desordre, charire, monstre, tendre, tigre, entre, fievre, diametre, arbitre, nombre, and others, were reduced to the English form of spelling; chamber, disaster, disorder, charter, monster, tender, tiger, enter, fever, diameter, arbiter, number. At a later period, Sir Isaac Newton, Camden, Selden, Milton, Whitaker, Prideaux, Hook, Whiston, Bryant, and other authors of the first character, attempted to carry through this reformation, writing scepter, center, sepulcher. But this improvement was arrested, and a few words of this class retain their French orthography; such are metre, mitre, nitre, spectre, sceptre, theatre, sepulchre, and centre. It is remarkable that a nation distinguished for erudition, should thus reject improvements, and retain anomalies, in opposition to all the convenience of uniformity. In the present instance, want of uniformity is not the only evil. The present orthography has introduced an awkward mode of writing the derivatives, for example, centred, sceptred, sepulchred; whereas Milton and Pope wrote these words as regular derivations of center, scepter, sepulcher: thus, "sceptered king." So Coxe, in his Travels, "The principal wealth of the church is centered in the monasteries." This is correct.

7. Soon after the revival of letters in Europe, English writers began to borrow words from the French and Italian; and usually with some little alteration of the orthography. Thus they wrote authour, embassadour, predecessour, ancestour, successour; using our for the Latin termination or, and the French eur, and writing similar words in like manner, though not of Latin or French original. What motive could induce them to write these words, and errour, honour, favour, inferiour, &c., in this manner, following neither the Latin nor the French, I cannot conceive. But this orthography continued down to the seventeenth century, when the u began to be rejected from certain words of this class, and at the beginning of the last century, many of these words were written, ancestor, author, error, &c., as they are now written. But favor, honor, labor, candor, ardor, terror, vigor, inferior, superior, and a few others, were written with u, and Johnson introduced this orthography into his Dictionary. Nothing in language is more mischievous than the mistakes of a great man. It is not easy to understand why a man, whose professed object was to reduce the language to some regularity, should write author without u, and errour and honour with it! That he should write labour with u, and laborious without it! Vigour with u, and vigorous, invigorate, without it! Inferiour, superiour, with u, but inferiority and superiority, without it! Strange as it is, this inconsistency runs through his work, and his authority has been the means of continuing it, among his admirers, to this day.

8. There is another class of words, the orthography of which is not uniform nor fully settled, such as take the termination able to form an adjective. Thus Johnson writes proveable with e, but approvable and reprovable, without it. So moveable, but immovable and removable; tameable, but blamable, censurable, desirable, excusable; saleable, but ratable.

With like inconsistency Walker and Chalmers write daub with u, and bedawb with w, deviating in this instance from Johnson. Chalmers writes abridgement and judgement with e, but acknowledgment without it. Walker writes these words without e, but adds it to lodgement.

9. Johnson writes octoedrical; Chalmers octoedral; Sheridan, Walker, and Jones follow Johnson; but Jones has octahedron, which is not in the other Dictionaries. The Greek, in words of this kind, is inconsistent, for οκτω is changed, in compound words, to οκτα.

10. Johnson introduced instructer, in the place of instructor, in opposition to every authority which he has himself adduced to exemplify his definitions; Denham, Milton, Roscommon, Locke, Addison, Rogers, and the common version of the Scriptures. But what is more singular, this orthography, instructer, is contrary to his own practice; at least, in four editions of his Rambler which we have examined, the word is uniformly written instructor. The fact is the same with visitor.

11. Most of these and some other inconsistencies have been of long continuance. But there are others of more recent date, which admit of no apology, as they are changes from right to wrong. Such is the change of the correct orthography of defense, expense, offense, pretense, and recompense, by substituting c for s as in defence. This change was probably made or encouraged by printers, for the sake of avoiding the use of the old long s; but since this has been discarded, that reason no longer exists. The orthography, defense, &c., is justified, not only by the Latin originals, but by the rule of uniformity; for the derivatives are always written with s, defensive, extensive, offensive, pretension, recompensing.

12. No less improper was the change of sceptic into skeptic. In favour of this innovation, it is alledged that the word is from the Greek σκεπτικος. True; but is not scene derived from the Greek σκηνη, and sceptre from σκηπτρον, and ascetic from ασκητικος, and ocean from ωκεανος? Are not all these words in exact analogy with each other, in their original orthography? Were they not formerly analogous in the English orthography? Why violate this analogy? Why introduce an anomaly? Such innovations, by dividing opinions and introducing discrepancies in practice, in classes of words of like formation, have a mischievous effect, by keeping the language in perpetual fluctuation.

13. In like manner, dispatch, which had, from time immemorial, been written with i, was changed into despatch, on the wonderful discovery that the word is derived from the French depêcher. But why change one vowel and not the other? If we must follow the French, why not write despech, or depech? And why was this innovation limited to a single word? Why not carry the change through this whole class of words, and give us the benefit of uniformity? Is not disaster from the French desastre? Is not discharge from decharger? Is not disarm from desarmer? Is not disobey from desobeir? Is not disoblige from desobliger? Is not disorder from desordre? The prefix dis is more properly English than de, though both are used with propriety. But dispatch was the established orthography; why then disturb the practice? Why select a single word from the whole class, and introduce a change which creates uncertainty where none had existed for ages, without the smallest benefit to indemnify us for the perplexity and discordance occasioned by the innovation? Now let it be observed that Johnson himself wrote dispatch; for this orthography occurs twice under SEND in his Dictionary, and five times under SPEED.

14. The omission of one l in befall, install, installment, recall, enthrall, &c., is by no means to be vindicated; as by custom, the two letters ll, serve as a guide to the true pronunciation, that of broad a or aw.

15. It is an established rule, in the English language, that monosyllabic verbs ending in a single consonant, not preceded by a long vowel, and other verbs ending in a single accented consonant, and of course not preceded by a long vowel, double the final consonant, in all the derivatives, which are formed by a termination beginning with a vowel. Thus, fit, blot, bar, when they take the terminations ed, eth, ing, are written fitted, fitteth, fitting; blotted, blotteth, blotting; barred, barreth, barring. Abet, compel, form the like derivatives; abetted, abetteth, abetting; compelled, compelleth, compelling. The reason of this rule is, that without this duplication of the last consonant, the vowel of the primitive word would, in the derivative, be naturally pronounced wrong, that is, with its long sound; filing, bloting, bared, compeled. Hence we see the reason why verbs, having the long sound of a vowel, do not double the last consonant, as feared, repealed, repeated.

The converse of this rule is, that verbs ending in a single consonant, but having the accent on the first syllable, or on a syllable preceding the last, ought not to double the final consonant in the derivatives. Thus, limit, labour, charter, clatter, pardon, deliver, hinder, have for their derivatives, limited, laboureth, chartered, pardoning, delivering, hinderest. But, strange as it may seem, the rule is wholly neglected and violated in numerous words of this class. Thus we observe, in all authors, ballotting, levelling, levelled, travelled, cancelled, revelling, rivalling, worshipped, worshipper, apparelled, embowelled, libelling, and many others, in which the last consonant is doubled, in opposition to one of the oldest and best established rules in the language. Perry, in his Dictionary, lays down the rule for guidance, but has not been careful, in all cases, to observe it.

Not less remarkable is the practice of doubling the last consonant in equalled, equalling, but not in the verb equalize. And to add to the inconsistency, the last consonant is doubled in tranquillize, a word in exact analogy with equalize.

A singular instance of inattention to analogy or uniformity, occurs in the formation of certain words from the Greek. Thus in anatomy, bronchotomy, cacophony, euphony, lithotomy, and others, the final vowel of the Greek original is represented in English by y, which makes a syllable. But in epitome, catastrophe, hyperbole, and many others, the final vowel of the Greek is represented by e, which, in words of English origin, rarely or never makes a syllable at the end of a word. The consequence is, that the last two syllables are liable to be pronounced in one, tome, phe, bole. Such a departure from analogy is very inconvenient. Besides, if the letter y closed the words in the singular number, the plural would be regularly formed by changing y into ies.

A like fault is observable in the spelling of certain derivatives ending in er. In barometer, hygrometer, thermometer, and all similar derivatives, the Greek μετρον gives meter, in English, while in English books the word is written metre, like the French word. The French are consistent, for they write the word in the same manner, both when single and in composition. Such discrepancies in the English language are little honourable to English philologists.

In the use of the prefixes en, em, in, im, there is not uniformity nor settled usage. The French changed the Latin in into en or em, and English authors have adopted one or the other, without regard to any settled rule. Johnson's Dictionary has done something toward reducing the number of discrepancies of this kind; but some changes have, since his time, been introduced.

In the use of the prefix un, many changes have taken place within the last century or two, and the use of in has been substituted for un; as inaccessible for unaccessible.

In the use of the termination ize, the English books are all at variance with each other, and no lexicographer is consistent with himself. Hence we every day see authorise and authorize, apostatise and apostatize, temporise and temporize.

There are many words in the language containing superfluous letters, especially in the terminating syllable. Thus, one s in the syllables less and ness, at the end of words, is useless; one l in gill, rill, sill, dull; one f in cliff, bluff, are superfluous.

The rule for adding two consonants of a sort should be, to add two letters to the original word, when they are both wanted in the derivatives. Thus fil would give the sound of fill; but this being a verb, the two letters are required in the past tense and participles, filled, filling. So in the adjective stiff, the second letter is wanted in stiffen, otherwise a person would be apt to pronounce the word sti-fen.

But in some words the terminating consonant is doubled, not only without necessity or use, but in opposition to propriety. Plaintiff is the French plaintif; pontiff is the French pontife; and no possible reason can be assigned for adding an f to the original word, any more than for adding the same letter to brief and relief. And what is worse, the letter is doubled in pontiff, the original, and then omitted in all the derivatives, pontificate, pontifical, &c.

In like manner, the vowel e is added to a multitude of words, in which it is not pronounced, and is worse than useless, as it often misleads the learner in the pronunciation. If the final e were omitted in juvenil, volatil, the pronunciation could not be mistaken; but as the preceding vowel is sometimes long and sometimes short in the terminating syllables, ile, ine, ite, the final e serves only to perplex the learner.

In the terminating syllable ive, the final e is worse than useless, as the i is always short, iv, and the addition of e contravenes the general rule, that the vowel followed by a consonant and e final, is generally long, as in mate, mote, mute, dissipate.

Our modern writers seem to delight in this useless addition of e final; as they annex it to words without reason or authority. This fault occurs frequently in words borrowed from foreign languages, in which the letter is not found in the original language. One would suppose that good taste alone ought to correct this error.

It is much easier, however, to point out the anomalies, inconsistencies, and irregularities of English orthography, than to devise any effectual plan by which they may be removed; and we conceive that any attempt on the part of a lexicographer to introduce a regular and uniform system of orthography, based upon proper principles, would prove a complete failure. Horace justly remarks:—

> "Multa renascentur, quæ jam cecidere; cadentque
> Quæ nunc sunt in honore, vocabula, si volet usus,
> Quem penes arbitrium est, et jus, et norma loquendi."

And so it is in regard to orthography; the public will never take their mode of spelling from a Dictionary, but will rather expect that a Dictionary shall take its mode of spelling from them. Accordingly in this Dictionary we have adhered as far as possible to the established orthography of words, and in regard to those words of which there are different modes of spelling, we have endeavoured to select that mode which seems to be best authorized.

PRONUNCIATION.

As our language has been derived from various sources, and little or no systematic effort has been made to reduce the orthography to any regularity, the pronunciation of the language is subject to numerous anomalies. Each of our vowels has several different sounds; and some of the consonants represent very different articulations of the organs. That part of the language which we have received from the Latin, is easily subjected to a few general rules of pronunciation. The same is the fact with most of the derivatives from the Greek. Many words of French origin retain their French orthography, which leads to a very erroneous pronunciation in English; and a large portion of our monosyllabic words of Saxon origin are extremely irregular both in orthography and pronunciation.

If we can judge, with tolerable certainty, from the versification of Chaucer, the pronunciation of words must have been, in many respects, different in his age, from that of the present day; particularly in making a distinct syllable of e final, and of the termination ed. But no effort was probably ever made to settle the pronunciation of words, till the last century. In England, which was settled by various nations, there are numerous dialects or diversities of language still retained by the great mass of the population.

Towards the close of last century, Thomas Sheridan, an Irish gentleman, who had been the pupil of an intimate friend of Dean Swift, attempted to reduce the pronunciation of English words to some system, and to introduce it into popular use. His analysis of the English vowels is very critical, and in this respect, there has been little improvement by later writers, though we think none of them are perfectly correct. But in the application of his principles, he failed of his object. Either he was not well acquainted with the best English pronunciation, or he had a disposition to introduce into use some peculiarities which the English did not relish. The principal objection made to his scheme is, that he gives to s the sound of sh, in sudorific, superb, and other words where s is followed by u long. These he pronounces shoodorific, shooperb, shooperfluity, &c. This pronunciation of s corresponding to the Shemitic ש, he probably learnt in Ireland, for in the Irish branch of the Celtic, s has often the sound of sh. Thus sean, old, is pronounced shean. This pronunciation was no sooner published, than condemned and rejected by the English.

Another most extraordinary innovation of Sheridan was, his rejection of the Italian sound of a, as in father, calm, ask, from every word in the language. Thus his notation gives to a in bar, the same sound as in barren, barrel, bat; to a in father, pass, mass, pant, the same sound as in fat, passion, massacre, pan, fancy. Such a gross deviation from established English usage was of course condemned and rejected.

In his pronunciation of ti and ci, before a vowel, as in partiality, omniscience, Sheridan is more correct than Walker, as he is in some other words; such, for example, as bench, tench, book, took, and others of the same classes.

Sheridan also contributed very much to propagate the change of tu into chu, or tshu; as in natshur, cultshur, virtshue. This innovation was vindicated on the supposed fact, that the letter u has the sound of yu; and natyur, cultyur, virtyue, in a rapid enunciation, become natshur, &c. And to this day, this error respecting the sound of u is received in England as truth. But the fact is otherwise, and if not, it does not justify the practice; for in usage, u is short in nature, culture.

This innovation, however, has prevailed to a considerable extent, although Sheridan subjected the change of tu to no rules. He is consistent in applying this change equally to tu, whether the accent follows the t or not. If tu is to be changed to tshu, in future, and perpetual, it ought to undergo the same change in futurity, and perpetuity; and Sheridan, in pronouncing tutor, tutelage, tumult, as if written tshootor, tshootelage, tshoomult, is certainly consistent, though wrong in fact. In other words, however, Sheridan is inconsistent with himself; for he pronounces multitshood, rectitshood, servitshood, while habitude, beatitude, certitude, decrepitude, gratitude, &c., retain the proper sound of t.

Walker's rule for changing tu to chu, only when the accent precedes, is entirely arbitrary, and evidently made by him to suit his own practice. It has, however, the good effect of reducing the chus, and removing the outrageous anomalies of tshootor, tshoomult, &c.

There are many other words which Sheridan has marked for a pronunciation, which is not according to good usage, and which the later orthoepists have corrected. In general, however, it may be asserted that his notation does not warrant a tenth part as many deviations from the present respectable usage in England, as Walker's.

In a few years after the publication of Sheridan's Dictionary, appeared Walker's, the author of which introduces the work to the public with the following remarks on the labours of his predecessors.

"Among those writers who deserve the first praise on this subject, is Mr. Elphinstone, who, in his Principles of the English Language, has reduced the chaos to a system, and laid the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation. But this gentleman, by treating his subject with an affected obscurity, and by absurdly endeavouring to alter the whole orthography of the language, has unfortunately lost his credit with the public, for the part of his labours which entitles him to the highest praise."

"After him, Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement, by his Rhetorical Dictionary; but he has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation; those very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be consulted." [Let it be noted, that the same objection lies in full force against Sheridan, Walker, and Jones.]

"To him succeeded Mr. Sheridan, who not only divided the words into syllables, and placed figures over the vowels, as Dr. Kenrick had done, but by spelling these syllables as they are pronounced, seemed to complete the idea of a Pronouncing Dictionary, and to leave but little expectation of improvement. It must be confessed that his Dictionary is generally superior to every thing that preceded it, and his method of conveying the sound of words by spelling them as they are pronounced, is highly rational and useful. But here sincerity obliges me to stop. The numerous instances I have given of impropriety, inconsistency, and want of acquaintance with the analogies of the language, sufficiently show how imperfect I think his Dictionary is, upon the whole, and what ample room was left for attempting another, that might better answer the purpose of a guide to pronunciation."

"The last writer on this subject is Mr. Nares, who, in his Elements of Orthoepy, has shown a clearness of method, and an extent of observation, which deserve the highest encomiums. But he seems, on many occasions, to have mistaken the best usage, and to have paid too little attention to the first principles of pronunciation."

Soon after the publication of Walker's Dictionary, appeared the Dictionary of Stephen Jones, who undertakes to correct the errors of Sheridan and Walker. This author objects to Sheridan, that he has not introduced the Italian sound of a [as in father,] in a single instance, and that Walker has been too sparing in the use of it. He objects that Sheridan has not, by any peculiar marks, pointed out the sound of oi or oy as in noise and cloy; and that Walker has given distinct marks of pronunciation to the diphthong ou, which are terrific to the learner, and not well calculated to express the exact sound. He considers it as no trivial error in Walker's system, that he uses the long e in place of the short y, which gives to asperity, for example, the ludicrous sound of aspercetee. He notices also as a fault in Walker's scheme, that he makes no difference in the sound of oo in tool, tooth, and in look, took.

In all these particulars, except that of oi and oy, we think every man who understands genuine English will accord with Jones.

A few years after the appearance of Jones's Dictionary, William Perry published a Pronouncing Dictionary, in which an attempt is made to indicate the sounds of the letters by certain arbitrary marks. In this work, the author has rejected most of the peculiarities of Sheridan, Walker, and Jones, and given the language nearly as it was spoken, before these authors undertook to regulate the pronunciation. This author's manner of designating the sounds of the letters is too complex for convenience, but his pronunciation is nearer to the actual usage in England than that of either of his predecessors before mentioned. His orthography also is more correct, according to present usage, than that of his predecessors.

During the year 1828, appeared the Dictionary of R. S. Jameson, of Lincoln's Inn, intended to combine the merits of the most popular Dictionaries, and to correct the false pronunciation of Walker, whose notation, in some classes of words, he entirely rejects. He condemns, as a slovenly enunciation, the sound given to d, which, before i and u, Walker directs, in certain words, to be pronounced like j. He rejects also his notation of ch, or tsh, in congratulation, flatulent, natural, and all similar words. He rejects also the affected pronunciation of Sheridan and Walker, in such words as guide and kind. Most of the other errors of Walker he copies, as he does his antiquated orthography.

The English orthoepists have analyzed, and in general have well defined or described, the sounds and appropriate uses of the letters of the alphabet. Sheridan's analysis, which appeared a few years before Walker's, is, for the most part, correct; but in describing the sounds of what may be called the diphthongal vowel i, we think he has erred, in making it to consist of the broad a or aw and e. He admits, indeed, that the voice does not rest on the sound aw, but he contends that the mouth is opened to the same degree of aperture, and is in the same position, as if it were going to sound aw; but before the voice can get a passage to the lips, the under jaw is drawn up to the position for sounding e. On this it is justly remarked by Walker, that aw and e are precisely the component elements of the diphthong oi and oy. If the aw is pronounced, we would add, then i and oy must be pronounced exactly alike; and if aw is not pronounced, then it is not a component part of the diphthongal vowel i.

Walker contends that this diphthong i, is composed of the sound of the Italian a, as in father, and the sound of e. If so, he must have given to a a very different sound from that which we are accustomed to give it. But this is a mistake; that sound of a is no more heard in i, than the sound of aw. The sound of i in fight, mind, time, idle, is not faweght, mawend, tawem, awedle; nor is it fäeght, mäend, täem, äedle. Let any man utter the aw or the Italian a before the e, and he will instantly perceive the error, and reject both definitions, as leading to a false pronunciation. The truth is, the mouth, in uttering i, is not opened so wide as in uttering aw or à; the initial sound is not that of aw or à; nor is it possible, by any characters we possess, to express the true sound on paper. The initial sound is not formed so deep in the throat as aw or à; the position of the organs is nearly, yet not exactly the same. The true sound can be learned only by the ear.

Equally inaccurate is the definition of the diphthongal u, or long u; which these writers alledge to consist of the sounds of e and oo or yu. It has this sound, indeed, in certain words, as in unite, union, and others; but this is a departure from the proper sound of this character, as heard in cube, abuse, durable, human, jury. These words are not pronounced keoob, abeoose, deoorable, heooman, jeoory. The effort to introduce this affected pronunciation is of most mischievous tendency. The sound of e is not heard in the proper enunciation of the English u, and for that reason it should not be so stated on paper, nor named yu; as the error naturally leads to a corrupt pronunciation. Dr. Kenrick remarks, that we might as well prefix y to the other vowels, as to u, and pronounce them ya, ye, yi, yo.

But this is not the whole evil; this analysis of u has led orthoepists to give to our first or long u, two distinct sounds, or rather to make a diphthong and a vowel of this single letter. Thus they make it a diphthong in almost all situations, except after r, where they make it a vowel equivalent to oo or the French ou. They represent u as being equivalent to ew, that is, e and oo, in cube, tube, duty, confusion, endure, pronounced kewbe, tewbe, dewty, confewsion, endewre; but in brute, fruit, rude, intrude, ruby, they make u equivalent to oo; thus, broote, froot, roode, introode, rooby.

We know not where this affectation originated; it first appeared in Sheridan's Dictionary, but it is a most unfounded distinction, and a most mischievous error. No such distinction was known to Dr. Johnson; he gives the long u but one sound, as in confusion; and no such distinction is observed among good speakers generally.

The source of the error in this, as in another case to be mentioned hereafter, may be an inattention to the manner in which the articulations affect the vowels which follow them. To understand this, it will be necessary or useful to examine the anatomical formation of articulate sounds.

"An articulate sound," says Lowth, "is the sound of the human voice, formed by the organs of speech. A vowel is a simple articulate sound."

These definitions seem not to be sufficiently accurate. Articulation, in human speech, is the jointing, juncture, or closing of the organs, which precedes and follows the vowels or open sounds, and which partially or totally intercepts the voice. A vowel or vocal sound is formed simply by opening the mouth. Thus in sounding a or o, the mouth is opened in a particular manner, but without any articulation or closing of the organs. In strictness, therefore, a simple vowel is not an articulate sound, as Lowth supposes; and it is certain that many irrational animals, without the power of articulation, do utter vowel sounds with great distinctness.

An articulate sound, then, is, properly, a sound preceded or followed, or both, by an articulation or junction of the organs. Thus ba, ab, and bad, are articulate sounds; the vowel being begun or closed, with a junction of the lips, interrupting the voice, in ba and ab; and in bad, the vocal sound being preceded by one articulation and followed by another. The power of articulation constitutes the great difference between men and brutes; the latter being unable to articulate, can utter only vocal sounds. The imperfect articulations of the parrot and some other animals, form no exception that deserves notice.

We give the name articulation to the act of joining the organs, and to the character or letter which represents the junction. In the latter sense, the word is equivalent to consonant; and articulation may be considered the preferable term, as it expresses the fact of closing the organs.

Human speech, then, consists of vocal sounds separated and modified by articulations of the organs. We open the mouth in a particular manner, to utter a vowel; we then close the organs, interrupt that sound, and open the organs to utter a second vowel; and continue this opening and closing, to the end of the word. This process is carried on with surprising rapidity.

Now in passing from an articulation or close position, to an open position for uttering a vowel, it happens often that a very slight sound of e is uttered so as to be perceptible to the ear, either before or after the utterance of the proper vowel. This is remarkably the case with the long vowels preceding r, for such is the nature of that letter, that bare, mire, more, parent, apparent, &c., cannot well be pronounced without a slight sound of e, between the long vowel and the consonant. Thus the words above named are pronounced nearly baer, mier, moer, paerent, appaerent, and bare, mire, really form two syllables, though they are considered to be monosyllables.

A like case, though less obvious, occurs in uttering u, particularly after the labial and palatal articulations. In passing from the articulations, eb, eg, em, ep, or pe, to the sound of u, as in mute and pure, we are apt, insensibly, to utter a slight sound of e; and this utterance, which proceeds from the particular situation of the organs, has been mistaken for the first component sound of the diphthongal u. The same cause has given rise to the pronunciation of e before the vowel in such words as guide, guard, kind, guise.

The genuine sound of u long, detached from the influence of consonants, is the same in all the words above specified; and the reason why it has been made a distinct vowel after r, as in rude [rood,] is, that the organs are open before the sound commences, whereas, when it follows most of our consonants, the sound is commenced immediately after an articulation, or close position of the organs, as in mutable and infusion. For this reason, u has more distinctly its diphthongal sound after labials and palatals, than after r; but this accidental circumstance should not be the ground of radical distinctions, equivalent to the sounds of different letters.

There is, in Walker's analysis of the alphabet, an error peculiar to himself. This is, in making a distinction between the short i when it is followed by a consonant, and when it is not; as in ability. In this case, he calls the first i, in abil, short; but the second he calls open, and equivalent to e in equal. (See Principles 107, 514.) He also makes the unaccented y at the end of a syllable, precisely like the first sound of e in me, meter. Ability, then, written according to his principles, would be abileetee. Never was a grosser mistake. The sound of i and y in unaccented syllables, whether followed by an articulation or not, is always the short sound of e long, that is, e shortened; the same sound in quality or kind, but not in quantity. To prove this fact, nothing is necessary but an attention to the manner in which the words little and tiny are pronounced, when they are made emphatical by utterance. They are, then, pronounced leetle, teeny—and this we hear every day, not only among children, but often among adults. In this change of pronunciation, there is nothing more than a prolongation of the sound of i, which, in the syllables, lit, tin, is short, in leetle, teeny, is long.

In consequence of this mistake, Walker has uniformly made a different notation of i when accented, and followed by a consonant in the same syllable, and when it stands alone in the syllable and unaccented. Thus to the first i in ability he assigns a different sound from that of the second; and in article, he gives to i the sound of e long, arteecle; but in articular, articulate, he gives it the short sound, tik. It is in consequence of this mistake, that he has throughout his Dictionary assigned to i and y unaccented, and to y unaccented terminating words, the sound of e long; an error, which, it is ascertained by actual enumeration, extends to more than eleven thousand vowels or syllables; an error, which, if carried to the full extent of his principles, would subvert all the rules of English versification. Jones and Perry have corrected this error in their notations, throughout the language.

If it should be said that Walker did not intend to direct y in this case, to be pronounced as e long, but that his notation is intended only to mark the quality of the sound; it may be replied, he either intended the sound to be that of e long, according to his express direction, or he did not. If he did, his notation is not according to any good practice, and by changing a short vowel into a long one, his notation would subvert the rules of metrical composition. If he did not, his notation is adapted to mislead the learner, and it does mislead learners, wherever his book is strictly followed. In truth, this notation is generally condemned, and universally rejected in practice.*

In the notation of sounds, there is a mistake and inconsistency in all the orthoepists, which deserves notice, not on account of its practical importance so much, as to expose an error in syllabication or the division of words into syllables, which has been maintained by all writers in Great Britain, from time immemorial. The rule is, that "a single consonant between two vowels must be joined to the latter syllable." According to this rule, habit, baron, tenet, are to be divided thus, ha-bit, ba-ron, te-net.

This rule is wholly arbitrary, and has for ages retarded and rendered difficult the acquisition of the language by children. How is it possible that men of discernment should support a rule, that in thousands of words makes it necessary to break a syllable, detaching one of the letters essential to it, and giving it a place in the next? In the words above mentioned, hab, bar, ten, are distinct syllables, which cannot be divided without violence. In many words, as in these, this syllable is the radix of the word; the other syllable being formative or adventitious. But where this is not the case, convenience requires that syllables should, if possible, be kept entire; and in all cases, the division of syllables should, as far as possible, be such as to lead the learner to a just pronunciation.

As in our language the long and short vowels are not distinguished by differences of character, when we see a single consonant between vowels, we cannot determine, from the preceding vowel character, whether the sound is long or short. A stranger to the language knows not whether to pronounce habit, ha-bit or habit, till he is instructed in the customary pronunciation. It was probably to avoid this inconvenience, that our ancestors wrote two consonants instead of one in a great number of words, as in banner, dinner. In this respect, however, there is no uniformity in English; as we have generally retained the orthography of the languages from which we have received the words, as in tutor, rigor, silent, and the like.

Now it should be observed that although we often see the consonant doubled, as in banner, yet no more than one articulation in these cases is ever used in speaking. We close the organs but once between the first and second syllable, nor is it possible to use both the letters n, without pronouncing ban, then intermitting the voice entirely, opening the organs and closing them a second time. Hence in all cases, when the same consonant is written twice between vowels, as in banner, dinner, better, one of them only is represented by an articulation of the organs, the other is useless, except that it prevents any mistake as to the sound of the preceding vowel.

In the notation of all the orthoepists, there is inconsistency, at least, if not error. If they intend to express the true pronunciation by using the precise letters necessary for the purpose, they all err. For instance, they write bar′run for bar′on, when one articulation only is, or possibly can be, used; so also ballance, biggot, biggamy, mellon, mettaphor, mellody. This is not only useless, for the use of the accent after the consonant, as bar′on, bal′ance, big′ot, mel′on, &c., completely answers the purpose of determining the pronunciation; but it is contradictory to their own practice in a vast number of cases. Thus they write one consonant only in civil, civic, rivet; and Walker writes kollonade, doubling l, but kolony, kolonise, with a single l. This want of system is observable in all the books which are offered to the public as standards of orthoepy.

A still greater fault, because it may lead to innumerable practical errors, consists in the notation of unaccented syllables. In this particular, there is error and discrepancy in the schemes of the orthoepists, which shows the utter impossibility of carrying them into effect. The final y unaccented, Walker makes to be e long, as we have before observed; while Sheridan, Jones, and Perry, make it equivalent to short i, or at least, give it a short sound, according to universal practice. Walker pronounces the last vowel in natural and national, as a short; Sheridan, as e short, naturel; Jones, as u short, naturul. Sheridan's notation may be a mistake, for he gives to al in national, the sound of ul. In the adjective, deliberate, Walker and Jones give a in the last syllable its proper long sound; and Sheridan, the sound of e short, deliberet. Dignitary is pronounced by Sheridan dignitery, and Walker and Jones give to a its short sound, as in at. The terminating syllable ness is pronounced by Walker and Jones nes, by Sheridan nis, as blessednes, blessednis. The same difference exists in their notation of less; Sheridan pronouncing it lis, as in blamelis, and Walker and Jones giving e its proper sound. These differences, and many others, run through their works, and appear in a large portion of all the words in the language.

Now it is probable that all these gentlemen pronounced these words alike, or so nearly alike that no difference would be noticed by a bystander. The mischief of these notations is, that attempts are made to express minute distinctions or shades of sounds, so to speak, which cannot be represented to the eye by characters. A great part of the notations must necessarily be inaccurate, and for this reason, the notation of the vowels in unaccented syllables should not be attempted. From a careful attention to this subject, we are persuaded that all such notations are useless, and many of them mischievous, as they lead to a wrong pronunciation. In no case can the true pronunciation of words in a language be accurately and completely expressed on paper; it can be caught only by the ear, and by practice. No attempt has ever been made to mark the pronunciation of all the vowels in any other language; and in our language it is worse than useless.

As Walker's pronunciation has been represented as the standard, we shall confine our remarks chiefly to his work, with a view to ascertain its merits, and correct any erroneous impressions which have been received from such representations.

1. The first class of words which we shall mention is that in which a has what is called its Italian sound, as we pronounce it in father, psalm, calm. From a hasty enumeration of words of this class, we find there are two or three hundred in number, in which Walker gives to a its short sound, as in fat, bat, fancy, when, in fact, the most respectable usage gives that letter its Italian sound. This error Jones and Perry have corrected.

2. The notation of the sound of oo by Walker, is wrong in most or all the words in which oo are followed by k, and in some others. Notwithstanding the distinction between the long and short sound of oo is clear, and well established in a great number of words, yet he assigns the short sound to eight words only, viz. wool, wood, good, hood, foot, stood, understood, and withstood. (Prin 307.) It seems inconceivable that a man, bred or resident in London, should assign to oo in book, cook, took, and other like words, the same sound as in cool, boom, boot, food. Jones and Perry have corrected this notation, and given the pronunciation according to good usage.

3. To the letters ch in bench, bunch, clinch, drench, inch, tench, wrench, and many other words, Walker gives the French sound, that is, the sound of sh, instead of ch, as bensh, insh, &c. It would seem by this and other examples of wrong notation, that the author had been accustomed to some local peculiarities, either in London, where all kinds of dialects are heard, or in some other place. In this instance, he gives to these words a pronunciation different from that of other orthoepists.

4. It has been already remarked, that Walker's notation of the sound of i and y short, in unaccented syllables, which he directs to be pronounced like e long, in me, mete, is contrary to all good usage, and is rejected by every other orthoepist, except Jameson. Walker admits i to be short, when followed by a consonant in the same syllable. Thus the first i in ability is short, but the second i and the y are long e, abileetee. Now observe the consequence. In the plural, abilities, according to his rule, must be pronounced abileeteez; but the word is never thus pronounced; universally it is pronounced abilitiz; the last vowel sound is, in practice, immediately followed by a consonant, and by his own rule, must be short. Then the result is, y in ability is long e, but ie in the plural, is short i. And for this change of sound, no provision is made in Walker's scheme, nor in any other that we have ever seen.

* From the fact, which Walker relates of himself, (Prin. 246.) that he made a distinction between the sound of ee in flee and in meet, until he had consulted good speakers, and particularly Mr. Garrick, who could find no difference in the sound, it might be inferred that his ear was not very accurate. But his mistake evidently arose from not attending to the effect of the articulation in the latter word, which stops the sound suddenly, but does not vary it. It is the same mistake which he made in the sound of i in the second syllable of ability, which he calls short, while the sound of the second i and of y is that of long e. The celebrity of Walker as a teacher of elocution, and his Key to the Pronunciation of Ancient Names, which, with a few exceptions, is a good standard work, have led many persons to put more confidence in his English Orthoepy, than a close examination of its principles will support.

5. In the analysis of the sounds of our letters, Walker alledges the diphthong ou, ow, to consist of the broad a, or aw, and the Italian sound of u. According to his scheme, about, abound, round, now, vow, are to be pronounced abawut, abawund, rawund, nawu, vawu. But who ever heard this pronunciation? The fact is not so; the broad sound of a is not the initial sound of this diphthong; it is not commenced as deep in the throat, or with the same aperture as aw; it is a sound that can be learned only by the ear.

6. In noting the sound of the unaccented vowels, and those which have the secondary accent, there are mistakes without number, in all the schemes which we have seen, and one continued series of differences between the orthoepists. The following is a specimen.

Sheridan.	Walker.	Jones.
Deliverense,	Deliveranse,	Deliveranse.
Dignytery,	Dignetare,	Dignytary.
Anser,	Ansur,	Ansur.
Assembledzh,	Assembladje,	Assembladzhe.
Averaje,	Averaje,	Averedzh.
Barrin,	Barren,	Barren.
Penal,	Penal,	Penul.
Peunens,	Pennanse,	Pennunse.
Pennytenshel,	Penuetenshul.	Pennytenshul.
Pennytenshery,	Pennetenshare,	Pennytenshary.
Persunidzh,	Persunidje,	Persunedje.
Proksymet,	Proksemat,	Proksymet.
Proflyget,	Proflegat,	Proflyget.
Pennetrent,	Pennetrant,	Pennetrant.
Akkuzaturry,	Akkuzatore,	Akkuzatury.
Akkrymunny,	Akkremone,	Akkrymunny.
Allymunny,	Allemunne,	Allymunny.
Seremunny,	Seremone,	Serymony.

We take no notice of the different letters by which these writers express the same sound, one using e where another uses y, but of the different sounds which they give to the vowels in the second, third, or last syllable. Now, we appeal to any person who has a tolerably correct ear, whether it is the sound of a that is uttered by good speakers, or any speakers, in deliverance and dignitary? Is it the sound of a that we hear in the last syllable of penance, penetrant, and assemblage? Do we hear in the last syllable of profligate, the short a, as in fat? So far from it, that a public speaker, who should utter the sound of a so that it should be distinctly recognized in any polite audience, would expose himself to ridicule. The sound of the last vowel approaches to that of e or u, and the notation of Sheridan is nearest the truth. But any notation is worse than useless; for without it, there would be no difference in customary pronunciation.

To show the utter impracticability of expressing the unaccented vowels, in all cases, with precision, let the reader observe Walker's notation of a in the word moderate, and its derivatives. In the adjective and verb, the a is long, as in fate; in moderately and moderateness it is short, as in fat. This is certainly incorrect notation; no good speaker ever pronounces these words moderatly, moderatness. In addition to this, the a in the verb to moderate, is more distinctly pronounced than it is in the adjective, in which it has rather the sound of e, short, moderet; at least the sound is more nearly that of e than of a. And this distinction of sound, between letters in the same word, when an adjective, and when a verb, occurs in a multitude of cases; a distinction for which no provision is made in any system of orthoepy that we have seen, and one which must be left to the cognizance of the ear alone.

There is another class of vowel sounds that comprises too many inaccuracies to be overlooked. This is the class in which the first syllable has an unaccented e, as in debate. In all words of this kind, Walker directs the letter e to have its long sound, as in me, mete. Then, become, bedeck, begin, debate, debar, declare, elect, legitimate, mechanic, medicinal, memorial, necessity, peculiar, petition, rebuke, recant, relate, secure, select, velocity, &c., are to be pronounced beecome, beedeck, beegin, deebate, deebar, deeclare, eelect, leegitimate, meechanic, meedicinal, meemorial, neecessity, peeculiar, peetition, reebuke, reecant, reelate, seecure, seelect, veelocity, &c.

According to this notation, the first vowel e in evil, even, and in event, is to have the same sound, being all marked with the same figure. Now, let us ask, where a speaker can be found who pronounces these words in this manner? Who ever heard of such a pronunciation? This notation is erroneous and mischievous, as it is inconsistent with the regular accent, which carries the stress of voice forward to the next syllable, and must, necessarily, leave the first vowel with the feeble sound of short i or y. This short sound is that which we always hear in such words.

The like error occurs in Walker's notation of i in direct, diminish, and many other words. Walker himself, under despatch, calls the sound of e the short i; but under rule 107, says this sound of i cannot be properly said to be short, as it is not closed by a consonant, yet it has half its diphthongal sound, the sound of e!! This reason that i or e is not short, because the sound is not closed by a consonant, is entirely groundless, and contradicted by the universal pronunciation of thousands of English words. To direct such words to be pronounced deerect, deeminish, is inexcusable. This error corresponds with that specified under No. 4. supra.

Thus, there is neither uniformity nor consistency among the orthoepists, in the notation of the unaccented vowels; and it is hardly possible there should be, for many of the sounds are so slight, in ordinary pronunciation, that it is almost impossible for the ear to recognize the distinctions, and absolutely impossible to express them on paper. In truth, as Dr. Ash remarks, in a dissertation prefixed to his Dictionary, the sounds of the five vowels, in unaccented, short, and insignificant syllables, are nearly coincident; and it must be a nice ear that can distinguish the difference of sound in the concluding syllable of altar, alter, manor, murmur, satyr. It is for this reason that the notation of such vowels at all savours of hypercritical fastidiousness, and by aiming at too much nicety and exactness, tends only to generate doubts and multiply differences of opinion. If the accent is laid on the proper syllable, and the vowel of that syllable correctly pronounced, the true pronunciation of the word will follow of course; at least the pronunciation is more likely to be right than wrong, and no mistake will occur, which shall be an object of notice.

Nor can we approve the practice of writing all words in different characters, to express their pronunciation, as if their proper letters were so many hieroglyphics, requiring interpretation. A great part of English words have an orthography sufficiently regular, and so well adapted to express the true pronunciation, that a few general rules only are wanted as a guide to the learner.

7. Another error of notation, in most of our English Dictionaries, is that of the vowel in the first syllable of circle, circumstance, and many other words, the first syllable of which Sheridan first, and afterwards Walker and Jones, directed to be pronounced ser. Perry's notation makes the syllable sur, according to all the usage with which we are acquainted.

8. Another objection to the books offered as standards of pronunciation, particularly to the Dictionaries of Sheridan and Walker, is that the rules are inconsistent, or the execution of the work is inconsistent with the rules.

A remarkable instance of inconsistency occurs in the following words. Armature, aperture, breviature, feature, &c., Walker pronounces armatshure, apertshure, breviatshure, overtshure; but forfeiture is forfeetyure, and judicature, ligature, literature, miniature, nunciature, portraiture, prefecture, quadrature, signature, are pronounced as here written. Can any reason be possibly assigned for such inconsistency?

9. Obedience and its family of words, Walker pronounces obejeence, obejeent, obejeently; but disobedience, disobedient, as here written. Expedient is either as here written, or expe- frent; but expedience without the alternative. Why this inconsistency?

10. Obdurate, obduracy, are marked to be pronounced obdurate or objurate, obduracy or objuracy; but objurately, objurateness, without an alternative. In these last words occurs another error, the a in the third syllable is made short, as if pronounced rat; a deviation from all good usage.

This notation of obdurate is inconsistent also with that of indurate, and with that of obdure; an inconsistency which appears to have no plausible pretext.

The conversion of d into j before i is rejected, we believe, in all words, by Jones, Perry, and Jameson, and before u is rejected by Perry and Jameson, and in many words by Jones. It is a departure from orthography wholly inexcusable.

11. Walker (Principles, No. 92,) lays it down as a rule, that when a is preceded by the gutturals hard g or c, [he should have said palatals,] it is, in polite pronunciation, softened by the intervention of a sound like e, so that card, cart, guard, regard, are pronounced like keard, keart, gheard, regheard. Now it is remarkable that in the vocabulary or dictionary, the author has departed from his rule, for in not one of the foregoing words, except guard, nor in a multitude of other words which fall within the rule, has he directed this sound of e before the following vowel. Had he conformed to his own rule, he must have perverted the pronunciation of car, carbuncle, care, carcass, cardinal, cargo, garden, garter, discard, and a long list of other words, too long to be here enumerated. The English orthoepists now confine this prepositive sound of e to guard, guarantee, guardian, guile, kind, and a few others. The probable origin of this fault has been already assigned, in treating of the letter u. It is an affected pronunciation, which Nares calls "a monster, peculiar to the stage." Indeed, this slender sound of e before another vowel, is wholly incompatible with that manly enunciation which is peculiarly suited to the genius of the language. Perry and Jameson have rejected it.

12. In the first edition of Walker's Dictionary, the author, under the word tripod, observes, that "all words of two syllables, with the accent on the first, and having one consonant between two vowels, ought to have the vowel in the first syllable long." But this was too rash, for such words as cem'ent, des'ert, pref'ace, pres'ent, prof'it, reb'el, trop'ic, and a multitude of others, stand, in the author's book, in direct opposition to his own rule. In a subsequent edition, the author, or some other person, has qualified the rule by an exception in favour of settled usage. This exception destroys the value of the rule; and indeed there is, and there can be, no rule applicable to words of this class. The pronunciation of the first vowel can be known only by the usage.

13. Possess is, by orthoepists, pronounced pozzess; but why not, then, pronounce assess, assist, assassin, concession, obsession, with the sound of z? Can any good reason be assigned for making possess an exception to the pronunciation of this class of words? This utterance of sounds through the nose is always disagreeable to the ear, and should be restricted to words in which usage is established. Good taste should rather induce a limitation, than an extension of this practice. This remark applies also to some words beginning with dis, in which Walker goes beyond other orthoepists in giving to s this nasal sound.

14. Walker lays it down as a fact, that u has the sound of e and oo or yu. This is true in many words, as in union, unite, unanimity, &c. Hence, according to his principle, u in these words is to be pronounced yunion, yunite, without the letter y prefixed. Yet he writes these and similar words with y, yunion, which, upon his principles, would prefix yu to the sound of yu, and the pronunciation would be yuyunite, or eooyunite. But his notation of this sound of u is not uniform; for he writes disunion and disunite without y, though it must be as proper in the compound as in the simple word. The same inconsistency occurs between use, written, yuse, yuze, and disuse, disuze.

15. There is a fault in Walker's notation of o, when it has the sound of oo, the French ou. In the Key, he marks o, when it has this sound, with the figure 2, and gives move as an example. Then according to his Key, o alone when thus marked, sounds as oo. But in the Vocabulary, he thus marks both vowels in book, look, boot, and all similar words. Then according to his notation, each of the vowels has the sound of oo, and book, look, are to be pronounced boo-ook, loo-ook. He certainly did not intend this; but such is precisely his direction, or the result of his notation; and a foreigner, without counter-direction, must be led into this pronunciation.

The same fault occurs in his notation of ee, as in meet and seek.

16. Volume, Walker and Jones pronounce volyume; why not then change column into colyum? Will it be said that in volume the u is long? This is not the fact; at least, we never heard it thus pronounced; it is always short in common usage, and so marked by Perry.

17. Ink, uncle, concord, concourse, concubine, are pronounced by Walker, ingk, ungkl, kongkord, kongkorse, kongkubine; and these odious vulgarisms are offered for our adoption. There can be no apology for such attempts to corrupt our language.

18. The words bravery, finery, knavery, nicety, scenery, slavery, are by Walker, and the other orthoepists, pronounced in three syllables, and imagery in four; the final e of the primitive word being detached from it, and uttered with r, as a distinct syllable. Why savagery has escaped the same fate, we do not know. It is obvious that in negligent practice, these words have often been thus pronounced. But the most correct pronunciation retains the original word entire in the derivative, the slight sound of e before r, no more constituting a syllable, than it does in more and mire. Take the following examples.

Of marble stone was cut
An altar carv'd with cunning imagery. — Spenser.

When in those oratories might you see
Rich carvings, portraitures, and imagery. — Dryden.

Your gift shall two large goblets be
Of silver, wrought with curious imagery. — Ib.

What can thy imagery of sorrow mean? — Prior.

Pronounced in four syllables, imagery, in these lines, makes a syllable too much, and injures the measure, and in the last example utterly destroys it.

19. Formerly, the words puissance, puissant, had the accent on the second syllable; although the poets seem, in some instances, to have blended the four first letters into one syllable. But the modern change of the accent to the first syllable is not in accordance with English analogies, and it impairs the measure of many lines of poetry, in which these words occur. In the adverb puissantly, it has a very bad effect.

The foregoing observations extend to whole classes of words, in which the genuine pronunciation has been changed, unsettled, and perverted. It would be inconsistent with the limited nature of this Introduction, to enter into an examination of every particular word of disputable pronunciation. It seems to be inexpedient and useless to bestow, as Walker has done, half a page or a page, on a single word, in attempting to settle some trifling point, or, in many cases, to settle a point that has never been disputed.

In proportion as the importance of settled usages and of preserving inviolate the proper sounds of letters, as the true and only safe landmarks of pronunciation, shall be appreciated by an enlightened people, just in that proportion will all attempts of affected speakers to innovate upon such established usages be reprobated and resisted.

The intentions of the men who have undertaken to give a standard of pronunciation, have, unquestionably, been upright and sincere; but facts have proved that instead of good, they have, on the whole, done harm; for instead of reducing the pronunciation of words to uniformity, they have, to a considerable extent, unsettled it, and multiplied differences.

Some of the differences of notation in the several books may be rather apparent than real; but with all due allowance for this imperfection of the schemes, we are persuaded that there are ten differences among these orthoepists, where there is one in the actual pronunciation of respectable people in England; and in most of them the notation, if strictly followed, will lead to ten differences of pronunciation, where one only now exists in actual practice.

This effect of multiplying doubts and diversities has resulted from very obvious causes.

1. The limited acquaintance of orthoepists with the general usage, and their taking the pronunciation of London, or some dialect or local practice in that city, for the best usage. The propagation of such a dialectical or peculiar practice would of course disturb the uniformity of any other practice in other parts of England.

2. The difficulty or rather impracticability of representing sounds, and nice distinctions of sound, on paper; especially in unaccented syllables.

3. The partiality of authors for the practice of particular speakers, either stage players or others, which would lead them to denominate that the best practice which had been adopted by their favourites.

4. A spirit of fastidious hypercriticism, which has led writers to make minute distinctions, that are liable to be disputed, and which tend only to perplex the inquirer, and generate uncertainty or diversity, where no essential difference had previously existed in practice. This spirit is continually producing new books and new schemes of orthoepy, and every additional book serves only to increase the difficulty of uniting opinions and establishing uniformity.

This view of the subject is probably the most favourable that can be presented. The real fact seems to be this; these men have taken for the standard, what they were pleased to call the best usage, which, in many cases, is a local usage or some favourite peculiarity of particular speakers, at least if they have had any authority at all; or they have given the pronunciation which happened to please their fancy, though not authorized by usage. In this manner they have attempted to bend the common usage to their particular fancies.

It has been in this manner, by presenting to the public local or particular practice, or mere innovation, for a standard, instead of general or national usage, that the authors above mentioned have unsettled the pronunciation of many words, and multiplied diversities of practice. These attempts to obtrude local usage on the public, and bend to it the general or national usage, are the boldest assumptions of authority in language that the history of literature has ever exhibited.

The English language, when pronounced according to the genuine composition of its words, is a nervous, masculine language, well adapted to popular eloquence; and it is not improbable that there may be some connection between this manly character of the language and the freedom of the British constitution. They may, perhaps, act and react upon each other mutually, as cause and effect, and each contribute to the preservation of the other. At the same time, the language is, by no means, incapable of poetical sweetness and melody. The attempts to refine upon the pronunciation, within the last half century, have, in our opinion, added nothing to its smoothness and sweetness, but have very much impaired its strength of expression as well as its regularity. The attempts to banish the Italian sound of a, and to introduce the sound of e before i and u, as in kind, guard, duty, &c., ought to be resisted, as injurious to the manly character of the genuine English pronunciation.

In order to produce and preserve a tolerable degree of uniformity and the genuine purity of our language, two things appear to be indispensable, viz.

1. To reject the practice of noting the sounds of the vowels in the unaccented syllables. Let any man, in genteel society or in public, pronounce the distinct sound of a in the last syllable of important, or the distinct sound of e in the terminations less and ness, as in hopeless, happiness, and he would pass for a most inelegant speaker. Indeed, so different is the slight sound of a great part of the unaccented vowels, in elegant pronunciation, from that which is directed in books of orthoepy, that no man can possibly acquire the nicer distinction of sounds by means of books; distinctions which no characters yet invented can express. Elegant pronunciation can be learned only by the ear. The French and Italians, whose languages are so popular in Europe, have never attempted to teach the sounds of their letters by a system of notation, embracing the finer sounds of the vowels.

2. To preserve purity and uniformity in pronunciation, it is necessary to banish from use all books which change the orthography of words, to adapt the pronunciation to the fashion of the day. The scheme now pursued is the most mischievous project for corrupting the language that human ingenuity ever devised. By removing the landmarks of language, all the fences which can secure the purity and regularity of the language from unlicensed depredations without end are demolished, the chief use and value of alphabetical writing are destroyed, and every thing is given to chance and to caprice.

ETYMOLOGY.

Irregular as is the orthography of the English language, and unsettled or corrupt as is the pronunciation, there is nothing either in English or in any other language of which we have any knowledge, which exhibits so strikingly the low state of philology, as the etymological deductions of words, or the history of their origin, affinities, and primary signification. To enable the young inquirer to estimate the erudition, correctness, or negligence of writers on this subject, and to awaken more attention to this branch of learning, we will state briefly the results of our researches, and the opinions which we have been compelled to form on the merits of the principal treatises on this subject.

The first example of etymology which we shall mention is that of Josephus, the historian of the Jews, who informs his readers, that the first man "was called Adam, which, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies one that is red, because he was formed out of red earth compounded together; for of that kind is virgin and true earth." Here is a mistake proceeding from a mere resemblance of words; it being certain that Adam no more signifies red earth, than it does red cedar. This mistake is connected with another, that Adam was the proper name of the first man, an individual; whereas the word is the generic name of the human species, and like man in English, signifies form, shape, image, expressing distinctively the characteristic eminence or distinction of form of the human race. This fact explains the use of the plural pronoun, in the account of the creation of the species. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea," &c.; Gen. i. 26. It is evident, also, that the words used in relation to the species, the image, the likeness of God, have reference, not only to their intellectual and moral faculties, but also to their external form; and so the apostle interprets the words, 1 Cor. xi. 7. Not that God has any bodily shape of which man can be the image, but that man has a superior or super-excellent form, corresponding to his intellectual powers, and distinguishing him from all other animals. Now the mistake of Josephus has infected the Christian world for eighteen hundred years, and the mistake, with erroneous inferences from it, enters into the most recently published systems of theology.

Among the most celebrated authors of antiquity, who have written on the subject of language, is Varro, who has left a treatise De Lingua Latina. On this author's learning, Cicero, Quinctilian, and Augustine have bestowed the most unbounded praises. He is pronounced to have been vir egregius; eruditissimus Romanorum; peritissimus linguæ Latinæ et omnis antiquitatis, sine ulla dubitatione, *doctissimus. He was, doubtless, a man of uncommon erudition for the age in which he lived; and his etymological treatise may be consulted with advantage by persons who have knowledge enough of this subject to separate the certain or probable from the improbable and conjectural. But it is certain from what remains of his treatise, that his knowledge of the origin of words did not extend beyond the most obvious facts and principles. Thus he deduces initium from ineo; exitus from exeo; victoria from vinco. All this is well; and we have reason to think him correct in deducing vellus, fleece, from vellere, to pluck, as, doubtless, fleeces were plucked from sheep before the use of shears. And we have reason to believe him when he informs us that imber was originally written himber; that hircus was written by the Sabines fircus, and hædus, fedus.

Very different must be our opinion of the following etymologies.

Pater, says Varro, is from patefacio; ager cultus is so called because in it seeds coalesce or unite with the earth; referring ager, perhaps, to the root of agger, or the Greek αγυρω. Campus, he says, was so named because fruits were first gathered from the open field, deducing the word from capio. Next to this, were the hills, colles, so named colendo, from colo, because these were cultivated next to the open plain. That land or field which appeared to be the foundation of cattle and money, was called fundus, or it was so called because it pours forth [fundat] annual crops. He deduces cogitare from cogendo; concilium from cogitatione; cura from burning cor, the heart; volo from voluntas, and a volatu, a flying, because the mind flies instantly whither it will. How low must have been the state of philology, when such improbable conjectures as these could attract the encomiums before mentioned, from Cicero and Quinctilian!

The reader will find many things in Isidore and Priscian worthy of his attention, though much of what their works contain is now so familiar to scholars of moderate attainments as scarcely to repay the labour of perusal. But he who learns that Isidore makes oratio, a compound of oris ratio; nomen, a contraction of notamen; and that he derives verbum from verberato aere, will hardly think it worth his labour to pursue his researches into that author's works. Nor will he be disposed to relish Priscian's deduction of litera from legitera, because a letter affords the means of reading, or from lituro, to obliterate, because the ancients used to write on wax tables, and afterwards to obliterate what they had written.

Vossius wrote a folio on the etymology of Latin words; but from repeated examinations of his book, we are persuaded that most of his deductions are far-fetched, conjectural, and fanciful; many of them are certainly erroneous.

Menage and Minshew we have not consulted; chiefly because from such extracts as we have seen, from their writings, we are certain that little reliance can be placed on their opinions, except in cases too plain to be mistaken.

Junius and Skinner, the authorities for most of the etymologies of Bailey and Johnson, are sufficiently correct in referring English words to the language from which they are immediately derived, especially when the orthography is too plain to be mistaken. They inform us that father is from the Saxon fæder, that drop is from the Saxon droppan, that picket is from the French piquet, and the like. So Johnson informs us that accent is from the Latin accentus, and accept from the French accepter, Latin accipio. All this is well, but it can hardly be called etymology, or the deduction of words from their originals.

Whiter, in his ETYMOLOGICON MAGNUM, the first volume only of which we have perused, began his work on a good plan, that of bringing together words of the same or of cognate radical letters, and in pursuance of his plan he has collected many real affinities. But he has destroyed the value of his work by mistaking the radical sense of many words, and by confounding words of different elements.

Jamieson, in his Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language, has collected the affinities of words in that language, particularly words of Gothic and Teutonic origin, with industry, and probably with judgment, and a good degree of accuracy. In some instances, we think, he has departed from correct principles of etymology, and mistaken facts, and he, as well as Whiter, falls very short of truth in a most important particular, a clear understanding of the primary sense of words. Jamieson's Dictionary, however, contains a valuable addition to our stock of etymological materials.

To Horne Tooke are we indebted for the first explanation of certain indeclinable words, called conjunctions and prepositions; and for this let him have all merited praise. But his researches were very limited, and he has fallen into most material errors, particularly in his second volume.

The HERMES of Harris, according to Dr. Lowth, "is the most beautiful and perfect example of analysis that has been exhibited since the days of Aristotle." This, in our opinion, is not the character of the work, which, for the most part, consists of passages from the works of Aristotle, Ammonius, Apollonius, Priscian, and other grammarians. It is little more than a collection of the opinions of the ancient writers on philology, whose metaphysical subtilties rather obscure than illustrate the subject. To show how easily men may be misled by metaphysics, when applied to the plainest subject imaginable, take the following example from the Hermes.

"A respects our primary perception, and denotes individuals as unknown; the respects our secondary perception, and denotes individuals as known." [This is nearly a literal translation of a passage in Priscian, lib. 17.]

To illustrate the truth of this observation, the author gives the following example. "There goes a beggar with a long beard"—indicating that the man had not been seen before; and, therefore, a denotes the primary perception. A week after the man returns, and I say, "There goes the beggar with the long beard;" the article the here indicating the secondary perception, that is, that the man had been seen before. All this is very well. But let us try the rule by other examples, and see whether it is universal, or whether it is the peculiar and proper office of an or a to denote primary perception.

"The article a," says Harris, "leaves the individual unascertained." Let us examine this position.

"But Peter took him, saying, Stand up; I myself also am a man." Now, according to Harris, a here denotes the primary perception, and the individual is unascertained. That is, this man is one I have never seen before.

"He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Whether a, in this sentence, denotes first perception, I cannot determine; but sure I am the individual is not left unascertained.

A. B. says to me, "I have lately dismissed an old servant, who has lived with me for thirty years." Here an may present a primary perception to the hearer, but not so to the speaker. To both, the individual must be well ascertained.

It appears, then, that this definition of an or a is incorrect, and the pains of these metaphysical writers who form such perfect analyses of language is little better than learned trifling. On testing the real character of an or a by usage and facts, we find it is merely the adjective one, in its Saxon orthography, and that its sole use is to denote one, whether the individual is known or unknown, definite or indefinite.

Again, Harris translates and adopts the definition which Aristotle has given of a conjunction. "An articulate sound or part of speech devoid of signification by itself, but so formed as to help signification, by making two or more significant sentences to be one significant sentence."

This is so far from being true, that some of the conjunctions are verbs, equivalent to join, unite, or add, in the imperative mood. In like manner, the prepositions called inseparable, and used as prefixes, are all significant per se, although by custom they sometimes lose their appropriate use. For example, re, which denotes repetition, has lost its use in recommend, which is equivalent to commend, without the sense of repetition. But still it has ordinarily an appropriate sense, which is perfectly understood, even when first prefixed to a word. Let any person prefix this word to pronounce for the first time, and direct a boy fourteen years old to repronounce his oration, and he would perfectly well understand the direction.

Bryant, the author of "An Analysis of Ancient Mythology," has given to the public a history of the Cuthites or descendants of Ham, a race of bold adventurers, who, as he supposes, made expeditions by sea and land, introducing arts, founding cities, and corrupting religion by the propagation of Sabianism. For proof of his opinions, he relies very much on etymology and the signification of names. Two or three examples of his deductions will be sufficient to show his manner of proof. Ham or Cham, signifying heat and the sun, he deduces from חמם, to be hot, to heat. So far he may be correct. But he goes on to deduce from this root, also, as Castle had done before him, the Greek καυμα, heat, not considering that this is from καιω, to burn, in which m is not radical, but probably s is the radical consonant, as this occurs in the derivatives. Καυμα has no connection with Ham. From Cam or Cham he then deduces the Latin camera, Gr. καμαρα, an arched roof or vault, whence our chamber, though it is not easy to discover the connection between this word and heat; and from the same root he deduces Camillus, Camilla, and many other words, without any support for his opinions, but a mere similarity of orthography in the first syllable. In all this he is certainly wrong.

The Greek Θεος, God, he supposes, most unwarrantably, to be formed from the Egyptian Theuth or Thoth, Mercury.

The sun he supposes to have been styled El-uc; El [ἡλιος] and uc or och, a title of honour among the Babylonians. This word, says Bryant, the Greeks changed into λυκος, [a wolf,] and hence the Latin lux, luceo. A strange conjecture this, not to call it by a harsher name. Now, if Bryant had examined the Teutonic dialects, and the Welsh, he would have seen his mistake; for the Saxon leoht, liht, Dutch and German licht, are from the common root of the Welsh llug, a shooting or gleaming, lluciaw, to throw, lluc, a darting or flashing, the root of luceo; a simple root, that can have no connection with El-uc.

Excepting Faber's work on the Cabiri, we have seen scarcely a book in any language, which exhibits so little etymological knowledge, with such a series of erroneous or fanciful deductions, as Bryant's Analysis. Drummond's Origines abounds with etymological deductions of a similar character.

Gebelin, a French writer, in his Monde Primitif, has bestowed much labour in developing the origin and signification of words; but a large part of his labour has produced no valuable effect. His whole system is founded on a mistake, that the noun is the root of all other words.

Of all the writers on etymology, whose works we have read or consulted, Spelman and Lluyd are almost the only ones in whose deductions much confidence can be placed. We do not name Camden, Hickes, Selden, and Gibson, as their etymological inquiries, though generally judiciously conducted, were very limited. This is true, also, in some degree, of Spelman and Lluyd; but the researches of Spelman into the origin of law terms, and words of the middle ages, have generally produced very satisfactory results. From the limited nature of the designs of Spelman and Lluyd, errors may have occasionally escaped them; but they are few, and very pardonable.

We know of no work in any language, in which words have been generally traced to their original signification, with even tolerable correctness. In a few instances, this signification is too obvious to be mistaken; but in most instances, the ablest etymologist is liable to be misled by first appearances, and the want of extensive investigation.

A principal source of mistakes on this subject, is a disregard of the identity of the radical consonants, and a licentious blending and confounding of words, whose elementary letters are not commutable. Another source of error is an unwarrantable license in prefixing or inserting letters, for the purpose of producing an identity or resemblance of orthography; a fault very justly opposed by Sir William Jones.

The learned Dr. Good, in his Book of Nature, Lecture IX. of the second series, suggests it to be probable that both papa and father, issued from the Hebrew source, אב. אבא. אבות. He then fearlessly ventures to affirm, that there is scarcely a language or dialect in the world, polished or barbarous, in which the same idea is not expressed by the radical of one or the other of these terms. True, the letter א is found in most words of this signification; although our knowledge of languages is too limited to warrant such a broad assertion. But the attempt to deduce all words signifying father, from the Hebrew, must certainly fail; for we know from history, that a great part of Asia and of Europe was inhabited before the existence of the Hebrew nation. Besides, a large portion of the European population have no word for father, which can be rationally deduced from אב. The Welsh tâd, whence our daddy, the Gothic atta, Irish athair, Basque aita, and Laponic atki, cannot be formed from the Hebrew word, the letter d and t not being commutable with b. One would suppose that a learned physiologist could not fail to assign the true cause of the similarity of words bearing the sense of father and mother, among the nations of the earth. The truth is, the sound of a is very easy, and probably the easiest for children, being formed by simply opening the mouth, without any exertion of the organs to modulate the sound. So, also, the articulations b, m, and d or t, being natural and easy, will generally enter into the first words formed by children. The labials are formed by simply closing the lips, and the dentals, by placing the tongue against the root of the upper teeth; the position which it naturally occupies in a healthy child. From these circumstances, we may fairly infer, a priori, that such words as ab, aba, papa, tad, mamma, must be the first words uttered by children. Indeed, were the whole human race to lose their present names for father, mother, and nurse, similar names would be formed by a great portion of mankind, without any communication between different nations.

The author further observes, that the generic terms for the Deity are chiefly the three following, Al or Allah, Theus or Deus, and God. "Besides these, there is scarcely a term of any kind, by which the Deity is designated, in any part of the world, whether among civilized or savage men. Yet these proceed from the same common quarter of the globe." True; men, and of course words, all came from a common quarter of the globe. But it so happens, that these three terms must have originated among different families, or from different sources, for they are all formed with different radicals, and can have had no connection with a common radix. But it happens, also, that not one of these terms, as far as we can learn, exists among the Slavonic nations, who compose a large portion of all the population of Europe, and whose name of God is Bog, a word radically distinct from all which the author has mentioned.

The author proceeds to say, "that the more common etymon for death, among all nations, is mor, mort or mut." But if either of these terms for death, is a native word among the great Gothic, Teutonic, and Slavonic families, which constitute the half or two thirds of all the inhabitants of Europe, we have not been able to find it. Besides mor and mut are words radically distinct, and thus originated in different families.

"Sir," says the author, "is, in our language, the common title of respect; and the same term is employed in the same sense throughout every quarter of the globe. In the Sanscrit and Persian, it means the organ of the head itself." He finds the word in Arabia, Turkey, in Greek, among the Peruvians in South America, in Germany, Holland, and the contiguous countries. In some of the languages of these countries we have found no such word; but if it exists, the author's inference, that the name of the head gave rise to this term of respect, (for this is what we understand him to mean,) is totally unfounded; and equally fanciful and unfounded is his supposition, that, by the loss of h from sher, the pronoun her, and the German herr, lord, are to be deduced from sir. In all this it is demonstrably certain there is no truth or even semblance of reality.

Man, the author deduces from the Hebrew מנה to discern or discriminate, [a sense we do not find in the Lexicons,] and hence he infers that the radical idea of man is that of a thinking or a reasonable being. With this word he connects Menu, Menes, Minos, and μενος, mens, mind; a sweeping inference made at random, from a similarity of orthography, without a distant conception of the true primary meaning of either of these words. But what is worse, he appears, if we do not mistake his meaning, to connect with these words the tane, tanato, or tangi, of the Sandwich Isles; words which are formed with a radical initial consonant, not convertible with m, and most certainly unconnected with man. See the words FATHER, MAN, and SIR, in the Dictionary.

The author offers some other etymologies and affinities equally remote from truth, and even from probability.

The governing principles of etymology are, first, the identity of radical letters, or a coincidence of cognates, in different languages; no affinity being admissible, except among words whose primary consonants are articulations of the same organs, as B, F, M, P, V and W; or as D, T, Th and S; or as G, C close, K and Q; R, L and D. Some exceptions to this rule must be admitted, but not without collateral evidence of the change, or some evidence that is too clear to be reasonably rejected.

Second. Words in different languages are not to be considered as proceeding from the same radix, unless they have the same signification, or one closely allied to it, or naturally deducible from it. And on this point, much knowledge of the primary sense of words, and of the manner in which collateral senses have sprung from one radical idea, is necessary to secure the inquirer from mistakes. A competent knowledge of this branch of etymology cannot be obtained from any one, or from two or three languages. It is almost literally true, that in examining more than twenty languages, we have found each language to throw some light on every other.

That the reader may have more clear and distinct ideas of what is intended by commutable letters, and the principles by which etymological deductions are to be regulated, it may be remarked that commutable or interchangeable letters are letters of the same organs; that is, letters or articulations formed by the same parts of the mouth. Thus, b, m and p, are formed immediately by the lips, the position of which is slightly varied to make the distinction between these letters. F and v are formed by the lips, but with the aid of the upper teeth. Now the difference of the jointings of the organs to utter these letters is so small, that it is easy for men, in utterance, to slide from one form into another.

The following examples will illustrate this subject.

Labial letters commuted for other labials.

English bear, Lat fero, pario, G φερω φορεω, D. voeren, G fuhren.

Here is the same word written in different languages with five different initial letters.

German wahr, true, L verus
Celtic lamh, lar, the hand, Goth. lofa
L guberno, Fr gouverner, Eng. govern

Dental letters commuted for other dentals.

Eng dew, G. thau.
Eng. good. G. gut
Eng. dare, Gr θαρρεω
Eng. day, G tag
Eng thank, D. danken
Eng. brother, D broeder.

Palatal letters commuted for other palatals

Eng. call, W. galw, Gr καλεω
Eng get, It cattare.
Greek, χειμα, L. hiems, winter

Dentals converted into sibilants.

Eng water, G. wasser
Lat. dens, a tooth, G. zahn
Eng let, Fr. laisser.
Ch כרית, Heb כרש
Sax. tid, time, G. zeit.

Change of linguals

Eng escort, Sp and Port escolta.
Fr blanc, white, Port branco.

Change of f into h.

Sp. habla for Lat. fabula; haz for facies, face, hacer for facio.

It is believed that n and r are sometimes convertible, as in Latin pono, posui, and also r and s, as in English won, German wen.

Letters formed by different organs are not commutable, hence we are not to admit a radical word beginning or ending with b, f, or v, to be the same as a word beginning or ending with g, d, t, r, or s, nor a word whose radical letters are m, n, to be the same as one whose elements are r, d, or c, t. If such words are in any case the same, they must have suffered some anomalous changes, changes which are very unusual, and which are never to be admitted without the clearest evidence.

ACCENTUATION.

Accent is the more forcible utterance of a particular syllable of a word, by which it is distinguished from the others. The accented syllable of a word serves, therefore, as a kind of resting place or support of the voice, which passes over the unaccented syllables with more rapidity and a less distinct utterance.

Accent is of two kinds, or rather of two degrees of force, primary and secondary. Words of one syllable can have no accent. Words of two syllables have the primary accent only. Words of three and four syllables may have the primary and secondary accent; but many of them have no secondary accent that deserves notice; such are dignity, enemy, annuity, fidelity. In words of four, five, or more syllables, a secondary accent is often essential to a clear, distinct articulation of the several syllables. Thus heterogeneous cannot be well uttered without two accented syllables; the fourth syllable receiving the principal stress of the voice, and the first clearly distinguished by more forcible utterance than the second, third, fifth, and sixth.

The accent of most English words has been long established, and, evidently, it has been determined by the natural ease of speaking, without the aid of rules or instruction. If any man should ask, why we lay the accent of such words as elocution, meditation, relation, congratulation, on the last syllable except one, the answer is, that such accentuation renders the pronunciation more easy to the organs of speech, and more agreeable to the ear, than the accentuation of any other syllable. The ease of speaking, and a kind of prosaic melody, resulting from a due proportion of accented and unaccented syllables, which enables the speaker to bound with ease from one accented syllable to another, without omitting those which are unaccented, are the two great principles by which the accentuation of words has been regulated. And it is to be extremely regretted that these principles should, in any instances, be neglected, or forced to yield to arbitrary reasons of derivation, or to a pedantic affectation of foreign pronunciation. When we know that the great mass of a nation naturally fall into a particular manner of pronouncing a word, without any rule or instruction, we may rely upon this tendency as a pretty certain indication that their accentuation is according to the analogies of the language, by which their habits of speaking have been formed, and this tendency cannot be opposed without doing violence to those analogies and to national habits.

Thus, formerly, the word horizon was universally accented on the first syllable, and this accentuation was according to the settled analogy of the language. But the early poets had a fancy for conforming the English to the Greek pronunciation, and accented the second syllable; the orthoepists followed them, and now we have this forced, unnatural pronunciation of the learned, in collision with the regular, analogous, popular pronunciation. By this affectation of the Greek accent, the flowing smoothness of the word is entirely lost.

In like manner, an imitation of the French pronunciation of confesseur and successeur, led the early poets to accent the English words on the first syllable, in violation of analogy and euphony, and some orthoepists affect to follow them, but public usage frowns on this affectation, and rejects their authority.

There are many words in the English language, indeed a large part of the whole number, which cannot be reduced under any general rule of accentuation, as the exceptions to any rule formed will be nearly as numerous as the words which the rule embraces. And, in most instances, we shall find in the structure of the words satisfactory reasons for the difference of pronunciation.

DISSYLLABLES.

No general rule can be given for the accentuation of words of two syllables. It is, however, worth observing, that when the same word is both a noun, or an adjective and a verb, it happens, in many instances, that the noun or adjective has the accent on the first syllable, and the verb on the last. Instances of which we have in ab'sent, to absent', con'cert, to concert'; ex'port, to export'. The reason is, the preterite and participles of the verbs require to have the same syllable accented as the verb, but if the first syllable of the preterite and participles were to be accented, it would be difficult to pronounce the words, as may be perceived by attempting to pronounce ab'senting, con'certed, con'ducted, with the accent on the first syllable.

In a few instances, the word has a different accent when a noun, from that which it has when an adjective, as Au'gust, august', gal'lant, gallant'.

TRISYLLABLES.

Words of three syllables, derived from dissyllables, usually retain the accent of their primitives. Thus,

Póet, póetess; pleas'ant, pleas'antly; grácious, gráciously; reláte, reláted; poli'te, poli'test.

In like manner, words of four syllables, formed from dissyllables, generally retain the accent of the primitives; as in collect'ible, from collect', ser'viceable, from ser'vice.

In all cases, the preterite and participles of verbs retain the accent of the verbs.

Words ending in tion, sion, tian, cious, tious, cial, cian, tial, tiate, tient, cient, have the accent on the syllable preceding that termination; as motion, Christian, precious, erudition, patient, &c.

Words of more than two syllables, ending in ty, have, for the most part, the accent on the antepenult; as gratuity, propriety, prosperity, insensibility.

Trisyllables ending in ment, for the most part, have the accent on the first syllable, as compliment, detriment; but to this rule there are many exceptions, and particularly nouns formed from verbs, as amendment, commandment.

Words with the following terminations, have the accent on the last syllable except two, or antĕpenult.

—fluous, as super'fluous, mellif'luous.
—ferous, as baccif'erous, argentif'erous.
—fluent, as circum'fluent.
—cracy, as democ'racy, theoc'racy.
—gonal, as diag'onal, sexag'onal.
—gony, as cosmog'ony, theog'ony.
—machy, as logom'achy, theom'achy.
—loquy, as ob'loquy, ventril'oquy.
—mathy, as polym'athy.
—meter, as barom'eter, hygrom'eter.
—nomy, as econ'omy, astron'omy.
—ogy, as philol'ogy, cosmol'ogy.
—pathy, as ap'athy, antip'athy.
—phony, as eu'phony, sym'phony.
—parous, as ovip'arous, vivip'arous.
—scopy, as deuteros'copy, aeros'copy.
—strophe, as apos'trophe, catas'trophe.
—vomous, as igniv'omous.
—vorous, as carniv'orous, graminiv'orous.
—tomy, as anat'omy, lithot'omy.
—raphy, as geog'raphy, orthog'raphy.

Compound words, as book-case, ink-stand, pen-knife, note-book, usually have a slight accent, that is, one syllable is distinguished by some stress of voice; but as the other syllable is significant by itself, it is uttered with more distinctness than the syllables of other words which are wholly unaccented. And in some words there are two accents, one on each component part of the word, which are barely distinguishable. Thus in legislative, legislator, legislature, the accent on the first syllable can hardly be distinguished from that on the third; and if a speaker were to lay the primary accent on the third syllable, his pronunciation would hardly be noticed as a singularity. Indeed there are some compound words, in which there is so little distinction of accent, that it is deemed unnecessary to mark either syllable or part of the word as accented.

As to a great part of English words, their accent must be learned from dictionaries, elementary books, or practice. There is no method of classification, by which they can be brought under a few simple general rules, to be easily retained by the memory; and attempts to effect this object must only burden the memory, and perplex the learner.

The differences in the accentuation of words, either in books or in usage, are not very numerous. In this respect, the language is tolerably well settled, except in a few words. Among these are acceptable, commendable, confessor, successor, receptacle, receptory, deceptory, dyspepsy, which the orthoepists incline to accent on the first syllable. But with regard to most of these words, their accentuation is contrary to common usage, and with regard to all of them, it ought to be rejected. The ease of pronunciation requires the accent to be on the second syllable, and no effort to remove it can ever succeed.

The words accessory, desultory, exemplary, and peremptory, would all have the accent on the second syllable, were it not very difficult, with this accent, to articulate the three last syllables of the derivatives, accessorily, desultorily, exemplarily, peremptorily. It is for this reason that the primary accent is laid on the first syllable, and then a secondary accent on the third enables the speaker to articulate distinctly and with tolerable ease the last syllables. If the primary accent is laid on the second syllable, there can be no secondary accent. Yet the natural accent of the primitives being on the second syllable of the three first, and the derivatives little used, we find good speakers often lay the accent on the second syllable, nor is it easy to change the practice.

It is further to be observed that there are some words which, in poetry and prose, must be differently accented, as the accent has been transferred by usage from one syllable to another within the two last centuries. Nares enumerates more than a hundred words, whose accent has been thus changed since the age of Shakspeare. Of this class of words are aspect, balcony, process, sojourn, convex, contest, retinue, converse, the adjective acceptable, which Milton accents on the first syllable, as he does the verbs attribute and contribute. But the accent of all these words has been changed; the eight first have the accent indisputably on the first syllable; the two last, on the second syllable.

Of Johnson's Dictionary, and of the manner in which the following work is executed.

Dr. Johnson was one of the greatest men that the English nation has ever produced; and when the exhibition of truth depended on his own gigantic powers of intellect, he seldom erred. But in the compilation of his Dictionary, he manifested a great defect of research, by means of which he often fell into mistakes; and no errors are so dangerous as those of great men. The authority created by the general excellence of their works, gives a sanction to their very mistakes, and represses that spirit of inquiry which would investigate the truth, and subvert the errors of inferior men. It seems to be owing to this cause chiefly, that the most obvious mistakes of Johnson's Dictionary have remained to this day uncorrected, and still continue to disfigure the improved editions of the work recently published.

In like manner, the opinions of this author, when wrong, have a weight of authority that renders them extremely mischievous. The sentiment contained in this single line, is of this kind; that we are to make no corrections, because we cannot complete the reformation; a sentiment that sets itself in direct opposition to all improvement in science, literature, and morals; a sentiment which, if it had been always an efficacious principle of human conduct, would have condemned, not only our language, but our manners and our knowledge, to everlasting rudeness. And hence, whenever a proposition is made to correct the orthography of our language, it is instantly repelled with the opinion and ipse dixit of Johnson.

Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?

A considerable part of Johnson's Dictionary is, however, well executed; and when his definitions are correct, and his arrangement judicious, it seems to be expedient to follow him. It would be mere affectation or folly to alter what cannot be improved.

The principal faults in Johnson's Dictionary are,

1. The want of a great number of well authorized words belonging to the language. This defect has been, in part, supplied by Mason, but his supplemental list is still imperfect, even in common words, and still more defective from the omission of terms of science.

2. Another great fault that remains uncorrected, is the manner of noting the accented syllable; the accent being laid uniformly on the vowel, whether it closes the syllable or not Thus the accent is laid on e in te'nant as well as in te'acher, and the inquirer cannot know from the accent, whether the vowel is long or short. It is surprising that such a notation should still be retained in that work.

3. It is considered as a material fault, that in some classes of words, Johnson's orthography is either not correct upon principle, or not uniform in the class. Thus he writes heedlessly, with ss, but carelesly, with one s; defence, with c, but defensible, defensive, with s; rigour, inferiour, with u, but rigorous, inferiority, without it; publick, authentick, with k, but publication, authenticate, without it; and so of many other words of the same classes.

4. The omission of the participles or most of them, is no small defect, as many of them, by use, have become proper adjectives, and require distinct definitions. The additions of this kind in this work are very numerous. It is also useful both to natives and foreigners, to be able, by opening a dictionary, to know when the final consonant of a verb is doubled in the participle.

5. The want of due discrimination in the definitions of words that are nearly synonymous, or sometimes really synonymous, at other times not, is a fault in all the dictionaries of our language, which we have seen. Permeate, says Johnson, signifies to pass through; and Permeable, such as may be passed through. But we pass through a door or gate; although we do not permeate it, or say that it is permeable. Obedience, says Johnson, is obsequiousness, but this is rarely the present sense of the word; so far from it, that obedience is always honourable, and obsequiousness usually implies meanness. Peculation, says Johnson, is robbery of the public, theft of public money. But as robbery and theft are now understood, it is neither. Inaccuracies of this kind are very numerous.

6. The mistakes in etymology are numerous; and the whole scheme of deducing words from their original is extremely imperfect.

7. The manner of defining words in Johnson, as in all other Dictionaries, is susceptible of improvement. In a great part of the more important words, and particularly verbs, lexicographers, either from negligence or want of knowledge, have inverted the true order, or have disregarded all order in the definitions. There is a primary sense of every word, from which all the other have proceeded; and whenever this can be discovered, this sense should stand first in order. Thus the primary sense of make is to force or compel; but this in Johnson's Dictionary is the fifteenth definition; and this sense of facio in Ainsworth, the nineteenth.

8. One of the most objectionable parts of Johnson's Dictionary, in our opinion, is the great number of passages cited from authors, to exemplify his definitions. Most English words are so familiarly and perfectly understood, and the sense of them so little liable to be called in question, that they may be safely left to rest on the authority of the lexicographer, without examples. Who needs extracts from three authors, Knolles, Milton, and Berkeley, to prove or illustrate the literal meaning of hand? Who needs extracts from Shakspeare, Bacon, South, and Dryden, to prove hammer to be a legitimate English word, and to signify an instrument for driving nails? So under household, we find seven passages and nearly thirty lines employed to exemplify the plain interpretation, a family living together.

In most cases, one example is sufficient to illustrate the meaning of a word, and this is not absolutely necessary, except in cases where the signification is a deviation from the plain, literal sense, a particular application of the term; or in a case where the sense of the word may be doubtful and of questionable authority. Numerous citations serve to swell the size of a Dictionary, without any adequate advantage. But this is not the only objection to Johnson's exemplifications. Many of the passages are taken from authors now little read, or not at all; whose style is now antiquated, and by no means furnishing proper models for students of the present age.

In the execution of this work, we have pursued a course somewhat different; not, however, without fortifying our own opinion with that of other gentlemen, in whose judgment we have confidence. In many cases, where the sense of a word is plain and indisputable, we have omitted to cite any authority. We have done the same in many instances, where the sense of a word is wholly obsolete, and the definition useful only to the antiquary. In some instances, definitions are given without authority, merely because we had neglected to note the author, or had lost the reference. In all such cases, however, we have endeavoured to be faithful to the duty of a lexicographer.

In general, we have illustrated the significations of words, and proved them to be legitimate, by a short passage from some respectable author, often abridged from the whole passage cited by Johnson. In many cases, we have given brief sentences of our own; using the phrases or sentences in which the word most frequently occurs, and often presenting some important maxim or sentiment in religion, morality, law, or civil policy. Under words which occur in the Scriptures, we have often cited passages from our common version, not only to illustrate the scriptural or theological sense, but even the ordinary significations of the words. These passages are short, plain, appropriate, and familiar to most readers. In a few cases, where the sense of a word is disputed, we have departed from the general plan, and cited a number of authorities.

In the admission of words of recent origin into a Dictionary, a lexicographer has to encounter many difficulties; as it is not easy, in all cases, to determine whether a word is so far authorized as to be considered legitimate. Some writers indulge a licentiousness in coining words, which good sense would wish to repress. At the same time, it would not be judicious to reject all new terms; as these are often necessary to express new ideas; and the progress of improvement in arts and science would be retarded, by denying a place in Dictionaries to terms given to things newly discovered. But the lexicographer is not answerable for the bad use of the privilege of coining new words. It seems to be his duty to insert and explain all words which are used by respectable writers or speakers, whether the words are destined to be received into general and permanent use or not. The future must depend on public taste, or the utility of the words; circumstances which are not within the lexicographer's control.

Lexicographers are sometimes censured for inserting in their vocabularies vulgar words, and terms of art, known only to particular artisans. That this practice may be carried too far, is admitted; but it is to be remarked that, in general, vulgar words are the oldest and best authorized words in language; and their use is as necessary to the classes of people who use them, as elegant words are to the statesman and the poet. It may be added, that such words are often particularly useful to the lexicographer, in furnishing him with the primary sense, which is no where to be found but in popular use.

The catalogue of obsolete words in Johnson, has been considerably augmented by Mason. We have inserted nearly the whole catalogue, which, we presume, amounts to seven or eight, and perhaps, to ten thousand words.

In exhibiting the origin and affinities of English words, we have usually placed first in order the corresponding word, in the language from or through which we have received it; then the corresponding words in the languages of the same family or race; then the corresponding word in the languages of other families. Thus, for example, the word break we have from our Saxon ancestors; we, therefore, give the Saxon word first; then the same word in the German language; then the Celtic words; then the Latin; and, lastly, the Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Arabic. This order is not followed in every instance, even of vernacular words, but it is the more general course we have pursued. When there can be no rational doubt respecting the radical identity of words, we have inserted them without any expression of uncertainty. When there appears to be any reason to question that identity, we have mentioned the probability only of an affinity, or inserted a query, to invite further investigation. Yet we are aware that many things, which, in our view, are not doubtful, will appear so to persons not versed in this subject, and who do not at once see the chain of evidence which has led us to our inferences. For this there is no remedy but further investigation.

In regard to words which have been introduced into the language in modern days, we have generally referred them to the language from which they have been immediately received. A great part of these are from the Latin, through the French; sometimes, probably, through the Italian or Spanish. In some instances, however, the order is reversed; indeed, it cannot always be known from which language the words have been received, nor is it a matter of any consequence.

One circumstance, however, deserves to be particularly noticed; that when a vernacular word is referred to the corresponding word in one of the Shemitic languages, we would not have it understood that the English word was derived or borrowed from that Oriental word. For example, we have given the Shemitic פרק as the verb corresponding with the English break, that is, the same word in those languages; not intending by this that our ancestors borrowed or received that word from the Chaldeans, Hebrews, or other Shemitic nation. This is not the fact. It would be just as correct for the compiler of a Chaldee or Hebrew Lexicon, to derive פרק from the English break or German brechen. So when we deduce coin, through the French, Spanish, or Italian, from the Arabic قَرْن, we do not consider the word as borrowed from the Arabic, but as proceeding from a common radix. With regard to vernacular words, in any European language, such deduction is always incorrect. Yet errors of this kind abound in every book we have seen, which treats of this subject. The truth is, all vernacular words in the languages of Europe are as old as the same words in Asia; and when the same words are found in the Shemitic and Japhetic languages, it is almost demonstrably certain that these words were in use before the dispersion; the nations of both families have them from the common stock, and the words, like the families of men which use them, are to be considered as of the same antiquity.

When, therefore, we state the words of another language as corresponding with vernacular words in the English, they are offered as affinities, or the same word varied dialectically, perhaps, in orthography or signification, but words from the same root as the English. Thus under the word bright, we state the Saxon word, and then the corresponding word in the Ethiopic, the participle of a verb; not that our ancestors borrowed the word from the Ethiopians, but that the verb from which bright was derived, though lost in the Saxon, is still retained in the Ethiopic. This fact proves that the ancestors of the Saxons once used the verb, but suffered it to go into disuse, substituting shine, scinan, in its place.

ENGLISH ALPHABET.

LANGUAGE or speech consists of human voices or articulate sounds, intended to communicate thoughts or ideas from one person to another.

Articulate voices are those which are formed by closing and opening the organs of speech; the lips, the tongue, the teeth, &c. An articulation is a jointing or closing of the organs, as in pronouncing ab, ed, op, un, at, eth, ag, eng.

Articulate sounds of the human voice are represented by letters or characters written, painted, engraved, or printed. A letter, or letters in combination, form syllables and words, which are the symbols of ideas.

To letters, syllables, and words, are annexed certain sounds, which, being uttered by the organs of speech, communicate ideas, through the instrumentality of the ears. When letters and words are written, painted, engraved, or printed, they communicate thoughts, through the instrumentality of the eyes.

In order to the communication of thoughts or opinions correctly, from one person to another, it is essential that both persons should annex the same sounds to the same letters and words; or that the letters and words used, should be symbols of the same thoughts, to both persons. This identity of sounds and symbols, constitutes a particular language, the instrument of social intercourse in a nation.

In the English language, the letters are twenty-six; representing sounds, simple or compound; or modifying such sounds.

Letters are of two kinds, vowels and consonants.

Vowels are vocal sounds, uttered by opening the mouth or organs of speech, without a contact of the parts of the mouth. The sound of a perfect vowel may be prolonged at pleasure, without altering the position of the organs. Such is the first or long sound of a, e, o.

The vowels in the English are six; a, e, i, o, u, y. But i and u are not always simple vowels; and y is sometimes used as a consonant. These letters also represent different sounds; a circumstance which creates much difficulty in learning the language.

The broadest or deepest vowel sound is that of a in fall, au in aught, aw in law. This sound requires the largest opening of the mouth. A less opening of the organs gives the sound of the Italian a, as in father, ask, last, mast. A still smaller opening gives the sound of a in fate, make; and a still smaller, gives the sound of e in mete, feet. The first sound of o, as in note, is made by a circular position of the lips; and with a less circular opening of the lips, we utter the sound of oo in tool.

The first or long sound of i is compound, as in pine; so is the first sound of u in due, suit, tribunal. These sounds cannot be exactly expressed or described in writing.

The first or long sound of each vowel is exemplified in the following words:—

a in make, name.	o in note, hold.
e in me, mete.	u in duty, mute.
i in pine, bind.	y in dry, defy.

The short sound of each vowel may be exemplified in the following words:—

a in mat, ban.	o in not, boss.
e in bet, men.	u in dun, must.
i in bit, pin.	y in pity, duty.

The vowel a has a third sound, called broad, as in ball, all, walk. The same sound is expressed by au in taught, and by aw in saw. This sound is shortened in what, quadrant, quality.

The vowel e has the sound of long a in a few words, as in prey, survey, their.

The letter i retains its French sound, that of the English long e, in some words which we have received from the French language; as in pique, marine, machine.

The vowel o, in a few words, has the sound of oo, the French ou; as in move, prove, lose. This sound of oo is shortened in book, look. In a few words o has the sound of u short, as in dove, love.

The first sound of y, as in dry, is the same as that of i in pine; and its short sound in glory, pity, is the same as that of i in pin, brisk. This short sound of i and y is, properly, the short sound of e long. Hence little, when the first vowel is prolonged, becomes leetle. Hence been is pronounced bin.

The short e in let, is nearly, but not precisely, the short sound of a in late.

The vowel u, in some words, has the sound of oo in book, as in pull, full, put.

The letter u, in some words, is pronounced yu, in which case it is anomalous, representing both a consonant and a vowel. This pronunciation occurs in words which begin with u, forming a syllable by itself; as in unite, union, unanimous; and before r, as in failure, measure, insure, and in a few other cases.

Some English writers alledge that the proper sound of u is yu. This is a great mistake; the true sound is nearly eu, but these letters do not express its exact sound.

The letter w has its form and its name from the union of two v's, in old books; v being called yu. This name is ill-chosen, and not adapted to express its sound. This letter is, properly, a vowel, with the sound of oo, French ou, but shortened in pronunciation, as in dwell, pronounced dooel'.

Two vowels rapidly pronounced in one syllable, constitute a diphthong; as oi in join; oy in joy; ou in sound; and ōw in cow.

Two vowels in succession, when one only is pronounced, do not form a diphthong. We denominate such vowels a digraph; that is, double written. Such are the following, ai, ay, au, aw, ea, ee, ei, eu, ew, ey, ie, ou, ui.

Consonants are the letters which represent the articulations of the organs. The letters of this sort, in the English language, are the following, in large and small characters:— B, b; C, c; D, d; F, f; G, g; H, h; J, j; K, k; L, l; M, m; N, n; P, p; Q, q; R, r; S, s; T, t; V, v; X, x; Z, z.

The articulations or jointings made by these letters, may be learned from the following syllables:—ab, ad, af, ag, aj, ak, al, am, an, ap, aq, ar, as, at, av, ax, az. Observe the point of contact in the organs which stops the sound.

The letters b, f, p, m, v, represent the articulations of the lips, and are called labials, or lip-letters.

The consonants d, t, l, n, and th, represent the jointings of the tongue and the upper teeth, or gum in which the teeth are inserted. For this reason they are denominated dentals, or tooth-letters.

The consonants close c, close g, k, and q, represent the articulations of the lower part of the tongue and upper part of the mouth, or palate: hence they are called palatals, or palate-letters.

The consonants s and z, represent the position of the end of the tongue near the upper teeth; and when pronounced, the breath issues or is driven out between the tongue and teeth, with a hissing; hence these letters are called sibilants, or hissing-letters. The letter c before e, i, and y, is precisely equivalent to s.

The letter r is uttered with a jar or vibration of the end of the tongue, near the upper teeth.

The letters j and x represent each two sounds; those of j may be expressed by dj, and those of x by ks. The consonant g before e, i, and y, is, in many words, the exact equivalent of j.

The close articulations interrupt all distinct sound; such are k, p, and t, as in ak, ap, at. These are called mutes. B and d are mutes, but less close.

C and g are close articulations at the end of syllables, as in public, rag. At the beginning of syllables, they are close before a, o, and u, as in can, cot, cud; gap, go, gun. But before e, i, and y, c is equivalent to s, as in cedar, city, cycle; and g is sometimes close, as in gift, and sometimes compound, as in general, ginger.

The consonants which represent articulations not close, are f, l, m, n, r, s, v, z; as in the syllables, ef, el, em, en, er, es, ev, ez.

H represents a breathing, and is denominated aspirate.

There are in English, four articulations, for which there are no single characters; but they are represented by ch, sh, th, and ng.

The sound of ch, as in church, cheer, may be represented by tsh.

The sound of sh occurs in shine, shall. It is precisely equivalent to the French ch.

Th are aspirated in think, thrōne; but vocal in that, thou.

The sound of ng is simple, and occurs in sing, thing, in which the articulation is not close. But in finger, linger, longer, the articulation is more close. Orthoepists have represented the pronunciation of the latter words as doubling the articulation; thus, fing-ger. But this is a mistake; there is but one articulation; nor is it possible to pronounce two consonants between two vowels, without two articulations; two closings and openings of the organs. Ban'er and ban'ner are pronounced alike, with one articulation. Thus consonants may be doubled in writing, but they are not doubled in pronunciation.

Orthoepists represent, that in the combination nk, as in ink, bank, n has the sound of ng. This is a mistake. The sound of ng is nasal, the articulation being less close than nk. If the n in such words had the sound of ng, then ink would have a nasal sound, ing, preceding k; but this is not the fact; on the other hand, the close articulation k, stops all sound. Walker, then, in representing bank, brink, as being pronounced bangk, bringk, entirely mistakes the fact.

RULES FOR PRONUNCIATION,

AND EXPLANATIONS OF THE MANNER OF DESIGNATING SOUNDS IN THIS WORK.

The first or long sound of the vowels is designated by a horizontal mark over the vowel, thus ā, ē, ī, ō, ū, ȳ. But the necessity of this mark is superseded in words and syllables ending in e, after a single consonant, as in fate, mete, rite, note, mute, in which the first vowel is long, and the final e is silent. So also in the last syllables of colonnade, fortitude, antipode, suicide, proselyte, consecrate, and others of similar formation.

The first sound of a vowel is also indicated by the mark of accent immediately after the vowel, as in fa'vour, ce'dar, vi'tal, glo'ry, tru'ly, cy'cle.

The second or short sound of a single vowel is indicated by one or more consonants terminating the word or syllable, as in ban, band, pen, bend, pin, flint, not, plot, sun, must, cyst, withstand, descend, rotund.

The short sound is also indicated by the mark of accent immediately after a single consonant, as in sal'ary, en'ergy, in'famy, bot'any, hus'band, sym'bol.

The third or broad sound of a is designated by two points under the vowel; thus, bạll, brọad. But the necessity of these points is superseded by a general rule, that in most words in which a is followed by ld, lk, ll, as in bald, balk, fall; the letter a has its broad sound.

This broad sound occurs in the digraphs au and aw; as in taught, law.

When this broad a is shortened, the sound is indicated by a single point under a; as in whạt, quạdrant.

The fourth or Italian sound of a is designated by two points over the letter; thus, bär, mäst, fäther.

The letter e, having the sound of a long, has a mark under the letter; as in prẹy, convẹy.

The letter i, when it has the sound of e long, has two points over the letter; thus, fatïgue, marïne.

The letters i and o, when they have the sound of u short, have a curving mark; thus, bĭrd, dŏve.

The vowel o has, in a few words, the sound of oo, French ou, which is indicated by two dots over the letter; thus, möve, löse. This sound, when shortened, is designated by two points under the vowel; thus, bọok, lọok; bụsh, fụll.

The two letters oo, without points, have the sound of the French ou; as in fool, room.

The digraphs ai, ay, always have the sound of the first or long a, unless otherwise marked.

The digraphs ea, ee, ei, ie, always have the sound of the first or long e, unless otherwise marked.

In all cases, when one vowel of a digraph is marked, that vowel has the sound designated by the mark, and the other is quiescent; thus, upbrāid, arrāyed, brēed, decēit, siēge, appēar, cōurse, flōat, brọad, vẹin, shōw.

By marking the vowel o, in the digraphs ou and ow, the digraph is distinguished from the diphthong; thus, in sōurce, ou are a digraph; but in sour they are a diphthong; and bōw, a weapon, is distinguished from bow, to bend.

Thus ou and ow, without a mark, are always diphthongs.

The digraphs eu, ew, and ui, have the sound of the first u; as in feud, brew, bruise. The writers who attempt to give u and ew after r, the sound of oo, as in rude, brew, [rood, broo,] encourage an affected pronunciation. In all such words, u and ew have the proper sound of u in duty, tumult, lucid, according to the general usage in England. Some persons affect to pronounce the letters e and w distinctly e and oo; but this affectation was condemned by Wallis, as early as the reign of Charles II.

The vowel i, in the termination ive, is always short; as in motive, relative, pronounced motiv, relativ.

The peculiar articulation of the letter r, renders it necessary to utter a slight sound of e short, between a vowel and that letter. Thus, bare, mere, mire, more, mure, are pronounced baer, meer, mier, moer, muer; so in parent, apparent, pronounced nearly paerent, appaerent. This necessity makes a slight variation in the sound of a, but too inconsiderable to deserve a particular mark of distinction.

The accented syllable is designated by this mark ′ at the end; as in la′bour, glo′ry, ten′or, amend′, det′riment, withdraw′, avow′, destroy′, renew′.

After syllables having two or more consonants followed by e quiescent, or a diphthong, the accent has no effect upon the vowel; as in dislodge′, rejoice′.

In many cases, the mark over the vowel designates both the sound of the vowel and the accented syllable; as in abrāde, upbrāid, dedūce, besiēge.*

The letters ch, in words from the French, are pronounced as sh, and over the letter c is a mark, thus ĉhaise, pronounced shayz.

When either of the consonants c, s, or t, is preceded by the accent, either primary or secondary, and followed by a diphthong or u long, it becomes aspirated, and is pronounced as if written sh, tsh, or zh. Thus nation, social, satiate, especial, disclosure, allusion, &c., are pronounced na′shun, so′shal, sa′sheate, espe′shal, disclos′zhure, allu′zhun, &c. When, however, the accent falls upon the vowel or diphthong following c, s, or t, the preceding consonant is not aspirated, as in the words soci′ety, sati′ety. The above rule is of very great importance, and obtains throughout the whole language, and even extends to all proper names, whether Latin, Greek, or Hebrew. The want of attention to it has led orthoepists into numerous errors.

When two accents occur after e or i, and before ci and ti, they indicate that the preceding syllable ends with the pronunciation of sh. Thus, pre″cious, vi″tiate, are pronounced presh′ous, vish′ate; the ci and ti blending into the sound of sh, in accordance with the rule above laid down.

In such words as pronunciation, euphony seems to require that cia should be uttered in two syllables, pro-nun-ci-a′-tion, to prevent the repetition of the sound of sh; pronunshashun.

Dr. Ash remarks, that the different vowels, in unaccented syllables, are pronounced alike or nearly so. Thus, in the words altar, alter, manner, manor, murmur, all the vowels of the last syllables have the same sound. Hence it is useless to mark the unaccented vowels; their sounds being too obscure and indistinct to be defined, or to be distinguished by marks. The nice distinctions between them, if any exist, are to be acquired only by usage and good taste.

The letters gh, in most English words, are quiescent. In the following, they are pronounced like f; cough, chough, clough, enough, hough, laugh, rough, slough, tough, trough.

H after r, is mute; as in rhetoric.

G and k before n, are mute; as in gnaw, knave.

W before r, is mute; as in wrest, wrong.

In a few words, h after w, is pronounced before it, as in what, which.

In the termination en, e is usually mute; as in broken, pronounced brokn.

The final e is mute after l, in the following syllables, ble, cle, dle, fle, gle, kle, ple, tle, zle.

B after m, is mute; as in dumb.

L is mute before k; as in walk, before m; as in calm; and before f; as in half, calf.

N is mute after m; as in hymn.

Ph are always pronounced like f, as in philosophy, but they are silent in phthisic, pronounced tizzic.

P is mute before s; as in psalm; and before t; as in ptyalism, Ptolemy.

In the terminating syllable of adjectives, ous, the letter o is always silent.

The unaccented y, at the end of words, is short, like i in pin, pit; as in glory, probity. In the plural of such words, ies are pronounced iz; as glories, pronounced gloriz.

But y, in monosyllables, has its first sound, as in dry, my; and in verbs the same sound occurs in the inflections; as in fly, flies; try, tries; pronounced flize, trize.

In the termination fy, the y has its first sound; as in fortify. So also i in the last syllable of fortifies.

S has its proper sound after f, p, k, t, and th aspirate; as in chiefs, caps, franks, pits, deaths.

S has the sound of z after b, d, g, gh, l, m, n, r, s and ss, z, v, aw, ay, ew, ey, ow, oy, sh, ng, th vocal ch, oe, ie, and after c followed by e final; as in robs, robes, races, rods, rides, rags, rages, toils, dreams, sighs, rains, bars, waves, roses, passes, mazes, laws, days, news, preys, cows, joys, brushes, sings, breathes, churches, foes, flies.

S before m has the sound of z; as in spasm, baptism.

The letter z, in Welsh words, is pronounced as the vocal th, in that, thou.

In many cases, a word, the better to express the pronunciation, is written a second time, in the letters most proper for the purpose. In this case, the pronunciation of the radical word is to be observed in the derivatives, unless otherwise noted. Thus, bright is written brite, to show the pronunciation; and this pronunciation is to be observed in its derivatives, brightness, brightly.

POINTED LETTERS.

Ā, ā, as in fate	Ö, ö, like oo, as in move.
A̤, a̤, broad, as in fall.	O̤O̤, o̤o̤, like oo, in good.
Ạ, ạ, as in what.	Ū, long, as in tune.
Ä, ä, Italian, as in father.	Ṳ, as in pull.
Ē, ē, as in mete, meet.	Ů, initial, as in unite.
E̱, e̱, first a, as in prey.	Ꞓ, as k.
Ī, ī, long, as in pine.	Ġ, as j.
Ï, i, e long, as in fatigue.	ĈH, as sh.
Ĭ, ĭ, short u, as in bird.	ꞒH, as k.
Ŏ, ŏ, short u, as in dove.	TH, vocal, as in that.
Ō, ō, long, as in note.

The letter u, it has been remarked, has the sound of yu in words in which this letter forms a syllable by itself; as in u-nit, u-nanimous, u-biquity, u-surp, and in some monosyllables; as in use, pronounced yuse.

An attempt to extend this sound to u after d, as in gradual, credulous, has resulted in changing the sound of d to that of dj; and gradual becomes gradjual or grajual; credulous is changed to credjulous, or crejulous. But this pronunciation of Walker is severely condemned by Jamieson and Knowles. So also Walker's butsheus for beauteous; plentshus for plenteous, are condemned and discarded. The same fate attends Walker's ingrejent for ingredient, and other words of a like orthography.

The present practice is to give to u the sound of yu, in such words as nature, feature, rapture; which are pronounced nat-yur, feat-yur, rapt-yur. This practice seems to have been adopted to avoid the common corruption of a change of t into tsh, as in natshur, a pronunciation condemned by the latest orthoepists.

But in words of more syllables than two, this pronunciation of u as yu, in the last syllable, as in caricature, literature, judicature, is not to be commended.

The termination ed, in the past tense, and participles of verbs, retains the vowel e, in this vocabulary, for showing the proper orthography, especially to foreigners; but in the customary pronunciation, this vowel is omitted, except after d and t. Thus abandoned, delivered, charmed, are pronounced abandond, deliverd, charmd. This rule extends to all cases, except to some formal uses of particular words, or to occasional uses of some words in verse.

After d and t this termination ed is, from necessity, pronounced as a distinct syllable; as in abraded, hated.

* It is said by some writer, that the accent never falls on a vowel, but always on a consonant. This is a great mistake. The last syllable of foresee has the accent on the last syllable, and on the vowels which end the syllable. In open, the accent is on the first syllable in which there is no consonant.

THE

IMPERIAL DICTIONARY,

ENGLISH, TECHNOLOGICAL, AND SCIENTIFIC.

A is the first letter of the alphabet in most of the known languages of the earth: In the Ethiopic, however, it is the thirteenth, and in the Runic the tenth. It is naturally the first letter, because it represents the first vocal sound naturally formed by the human organs; being the sound uttered with a mere opening of the mouth, without constraint, and without any effort to alter the natural position or configuration of the lips.

A has, in English, three sounds; the long or slender, as in place, fate; the broad, as in wall, fall, which is shortened in salt, what; and the open, as in father, glass, which is shortened in rather, fancy. Its primitive sound was probably aw. A is also an abbreviation of the Saxon an or ane, one, used before words beginning with an articulation; as, a table, instead of an table, or one table. This is a modern change; for, in Saxon, an was used before consonants as well as vowels; as, an tid, a time, an gear, a year. [See AN.]

This letter is prefixed to many English words; as in asleep, awake, afoot, aground, agoing, aboard, now-a-days, &c. The a in these instances, as Horne Tooke observes, is an abbreviation of on, an Anglo-Saxon preposition, with the meaning of in. In many words, the a in the beginning takes the place of on. Alive, for instance, means on life, i. e. in life. The a formerly often prefixed to our participles in ing, both in the active and passive sense; as, the house is a-preparing, he is gone a-walking, has the same origin.

Among the ancients A was a numeral, denoting 500, and with a dash Ā, 5000. In the Heb. Syr. Ch. Sam. and Ar. it denotes one or unity.

Among logicians, A, as an abbreviation, stands for a universal affirmative proposition. A asserts, E denies: Thus in barbara, a thrice repeated denotes so many of the propositions to be universal.

A is also used for anno or ante; as in anno Domini, the year of our Lord; anno mundi, the year of the world; ante meridiem, before noon; and for arts in artium magister, master of arts. Among the Romans, A.U.C., stood for anno ab urbe condita, from the building of the city, or Rome.

In algebra, a, and the first letters of the alphabet, are used to represent known quantities, while the last letters are generally used to represent unknown quantities.

In music, A is the nominal of the sixth note in the natural diatonic scale, and corresponds to the la of Guido. It is also the name of one of the two natural moods, and it is the open note of the second string of the violin, by which the other strings are tuned and regulated.

In pharmacy, a, or aa, (abbreviations of the Greek ana, which signifies of each,) are used in prescriptions after the mention of two or more ingredients, when it is intended that the specified quantity of each ingredient should be taken.

In chemistry, AAA, stand for amalgama or amalgamation.

In commerce, A stands for accepted, as in the case of a bill of exchange. Merchants also number their books by the letters A, B, C, instead of figures. Public officers number their exhibits in the same manner, as the document A or B.

In heraldry, A, as a sign, stands for the dexter chief, or chief point in an escutcheon.

In mathematics, letters are used as representatives of numbers, lines, angles, figures, and quantities. In arguments, letters are substituted for persons in cases supposed or stated for illustration, as A contracts with B to deliver property to D.

A. B. C. The first three letters of the alphabet, used for the whole alphabet. Also a little book for teaching the elements of reading.

AAM, n. [Ch. אמה or אמא, ama, a cubit, a measure containing five or six palms.] A measure of liquids among the Dutch, equal to 288 English pints.

By the English law, a legacy to a charity is abated by a deficiency of assets.—8. To remit; as, to abate a tax.

ABATE, v. i. To decrease, or become less in strength or violence; as, pain abates; a storm abates.—2. To fail; to be defeated, or come to naught; as, a writ abates. By the civil law a legacy to a charity does not abate by deficiency of assets.—3. In law, to enter into a freehold after the death of the last occupant, and before the heir or devisee takes possession.—4. In horsemanship, to perform well a downward motion. A horse is said to abate, or take down his curvets, when, working upon curvets, he puts both his hind legs to the ground at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times.

ABATED, pp. Lessened; decreased; destroyed; mitigated; defeated; remitted; overthrown.

ABATEMENT, n. The act of abating; the state of being abated.—2. A reduction, removing, or pulling down, as of a nuisance.—3. Diminution, decrease or mitigation, as of grief or pain.—4. Deduction, sum withdrawn, as from an account.—5. Overthrow, failure, or defeat, as of a writ.—6. The entry of a stranger into a freehold after the death of the tenant, before the heir or devisee. By 3 and 4 Wm. IV. the true owner can only recover the seisin by entry; and if the abator dies seised, the land will descend to his heir, but the right of entry or action of the true owner will still subsist.—Plea of abatement in law is pleaded to a declaration, writ, &c., on account of some defect in form.—7. [Fr. brisure.] In her., a mark annexed to coat armour, in order to denote some ungentlemanlike, dishonourable, or disloyal act, demeanour, quality, stain, or vice, in the bearer, whereby such coat is abated or lowered in dignity. There is, however, no instance of such dishonourable bearings; French writers, indeed, aver that such a bearing never had existence, and they assert it to be merely a figment of English Heralds.

ABATER, n. The person or thing that abates.

ABATING, ppr. Pulling down, diminishing, defeating, remitting.

ABATOR, n. A person who enters into a freehold on the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devisee.

ABB, n. [Sax. ab or ob.] In old writers, used for the yarn of a weaver's warp, and hence the wool of which it was made had the name of abb-wool.

AB'BA, n. In the Chaldee and Syriac, a father, and figuratively, a superior. Sans. appen. In the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic churches, it is a title given to the bishops, and the bishops bestow the title, by way of distinction, on the bishop of Alexandria. Hence the title Baba, or Papa, Pope, or great-father, which the bishop of Alexandria bore before the bishop of Rome.

AB'BACY, n. [from abba, Low Lat. abbatia.] The dignity, rights, and privileges of an abbot. It comprehends the government and revenues.

ABBAT'ICAL, } a. Belonging to an ABBA'TIAL, } abbey.

AB'BE, [ab'by] n. [from abba.] In a monastic sense, the same as an abbot; but, more generally, a title, in Catholic countries, without any determinate rank, office, or rights. Before the French revolution, it was the title of all those Frenchmen who devoted themselves to divinity, or who had at least pursued a course of study in a theological seminary, in the hope that the king would confer on them a real abbey; that is, a certain part of the revenues of a monastery. The abbes were numerous. Some acted as private tutors in families; others were professors of the university, and a great many employed themselves as men of letters. Abbés commendataires were such abbes as held abbeys in commendam—that is, with the right of administering their revenues or a part of them.

AB'BESS, n. [from abba.] A female superior or governess of a nunnery, or convent of nuns. An abbess in the Roman Catholic church possesses, in general, the same dignity and authority as an abbot, except that she cannot exercise the spiritual functions appertaining to the priesthood. [See ABBEY.]

AB'BEY, n., plu. ABBEYS, [from abba.] A monastery or society of persons, of either sex, secluded from the world, and devoted to religion. The males are called monks, and governed by an abbot; the females are called nuns, and governed by an abbess. Abbeys differ in nothing from priories, except that the latter are governed by priors, instead of abbots.

AB'BEY-LUBBER, n. A name given to monks, in contempt for their idleness.

AB'BOT, n. [formerly Abbat, from abba, latinized abbas, or from Heb. plural אבות aboth.] The superior or governor of an abbey or monastery. Originally monasteries were founded in retired places, and the religious had no concern with secular affairs, being entirely subject to the prelates. But the abbots possessing most of the learning, in ages of ignorance, were called from their seclusion to aid the churches in opposing heresies; monasteries were founded in the vicinity of cities; the abbots became ambitious and set themselves to acquire wealth and honours; some of them assumed the mitre, threw off their dependence on the bishops, and obtained seats in parliament. For centuries, princes and noblemen bore the title of abbots. At present, in Catholic countries, abbots are regular, or such as take the vow, and wear the habit of the order; and commendatory, such as are seculars, but obliged, when of suitable age, to take orders. The title is borne also by some persons, who have not the government of a monastery; as bishops, whose sees were formerly abbeys.

AB'BOTSHIP, n. The state of an abbot.

ABBRE'VIATE, v. t. [from L. abbrevio, brevio, from brevis, short; contracted from Gr. βραχυς, from the root of break, which see.] 1. To shorten; to make shorter by contracting the parts. [In this sense not much used, nor often applied to material substances.]—2. To shorten; to abridge by the omission or defalcation of a part; to reduce to a smaller compass; as, to abbreviate a writing.—3. In math., to reduce fractions to the lowest terms.

ABBRE'VIATED, pp. Shortened; reduced in length; abridged.—2. In bot. an epithet for the perianth. An abbreviated perianth, is one which is shorter than the tube of the corolla, as in pulmonaria maritima.

ABBRE'VIATING, ppr. Shortening, contracting in length, or into a smaller compass.

ABBREVIA'TION, n. The act of shortening or contracting.—2. A letter, or a few letters, used for a word; as, Gen. for Genesis; F.R.S. Fellow of the Royal Society. Abbreviations are generally employed to mark titles. They are also much used by lawyers, physicians, chemists, &c.—3. The reduction of fractions to the lowest terms.

ABBRE'VIATOR, n. One who abridges or reduces to a smaller compass.

AB'DITORY, n. A place for secreting or preserving goods.
AB'DOMEN, or ABDO'MEN, n. The lower belly, or that part of the body which lies between the thorax and the bottom of the pelvis. It is lined with a membrane called peritoneum, and contains the stomach, liver, spleen, pancreas, kidneys, bladder, and intestines. It is separated from the breast internally by the diaphragm, and externally by the extremities of the ribs. On its outer surface it is divided into four regions—the epigastric, the umbilical, the hypogastric, and the lumbar. —2. In insects, the lower part of the animal, united to the corslet by a thread. In some species it is covered with wings and a case. It is divided into segments and rings, on the sides of which are small spiracles, by which the insect respires.
ABDOM'INAL, a. Pertaining to the lower belly.
ABDOM'INAL, n.; plu. ABDOMINALS. In ich., the abdominals are an order of fish, whose ventral fins are placed behind the pectoral, and which belong to the division of bony fish. The loche, salmon, parr, argentine, atherine, mullet, flying fish, herring, and carp, belong to this order.

Parr.

ABDOM'INAL RING, or INGUINAL RING, n. An oblong tendinous ring in both groins, through which pass the spermatic cord in men, and the round ligaments of the uterus in women.
ABDOM'INOUS, a Pertaining to the abdomen; having a large belly.
ABDUCE, v. t. [L. abduco, to lead away, of ab and duco, to lead.] To draw from; to withdraw, or draw to a different part; used chiefly in anatomy.
ABDU'CENT, a. Drawing from, pulling back; used of those muscles which pull back certain parts of the body, for separating, opening, or bending them. The abducent muscles, called abductors, are opposed to the adducent muscles or adductors.
ABDUC'TION, n. In a general sense, the act of drawing apart, or carrying away. 2. In phys., the action by which muscles withdraw a part from the axis of the body, or of a limb, and also the state of a part so withdrawn; as when certain muscles separate the arm from the side, or the thumb from the rest of the fingers, they are said to perform the abduction of these parts, and the parts themselves are said to be in a state of abduction.—3. In sur., this term was formerly applied to a fracture in which the bone near a joint is so divided that the extremities recede from each other. - 4. In log., a kind of argumentation, called by the Greeks apagoge, in which the major is evident, but the minor is not so clear as not to require further proof. As in this syllogism, "All whom God absolves are free from sin: God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin."—5. In law, the taking and carrying away of a child, a ward, a wife, &c. either by fraud, persuasion, or open violence.
ABDUC'TOR, n. In anat., a muscle which serves to withdraw, or pull back a certain part of the body; as the abductor oculi, which pulls the eye outward. Its antagonist muscle is called adductor.
ABEAR,† v. t. abâre, [Sax. abæran.] To bear; to behave.

ABELE, or ABEL-TREE, n. A name of the white poplar.
ABE'LIANS, ABELO'NIANS, or A'BELITES, in church history, a sect in Africa which arose in the reign of Arcadius; they married, but lived in continence, after the manner, as they pretended, of Abel, and attempted to maintain the sect by adopting the children of others.
A'BELMOSK, n. A trivial name of a species of hibiscus, or Syrian mallow. The plant rises on a herbaceous stalk, three or four feet, sending out two or three side branches. The seeds have a musky odour, (whence its name, μοσχος,) for which reason the Arabians mix them with coffee.
A'BER, n. A Celtic term prefixed to the names of many places in Great Britain, and which signifies, generally, the mouth or entrance of a river. It is sometimes defined as the fall of a small water into a greater.
ABERDEVI'NE, n. [Carduelis spinus of Cuv.] sometimes called the siskin, a well-known song-bird, which has some resemblance to the green variety of the canary bird.
ABER'RANCE, } n. [L. aberrans, aberro, to wander from;
ABER'RANCY, } of ab and erro, to wander.] A wandering or deviating from the right way, but rarely used in a literal sense. In a figurative sense, a deviation from truth, error, mistake; and in morals, a fault, a deviation from rectitude.
ABER'RANT, a. Wandering, straying from the right way.
ABERRA'TION, n. [L. aberratio.] The act of wandering from the right way; deviation from truth or moral rectitude: deviation from a straight line.—2. In astr., a small apparent motion of the fixed stars, occasioned by the progressive motion of light and the earth's annual motion in its orbit; in consequence of which they sometimes appear twenty seconds distant from their true situation. — 3. Spherical aberration in optics, is a deviation in the rays of light when refracted by a lens, or reflected by a mirror, so that they do not converge and meet in a point or focus. It is occasioned by the form of curvature of the lens, or of the reflector, and the different refrangibility of the rays of light. Crown of aberration, a luminous circle surrounding the disk of the sun, depending on the aberration of its rays, by which its apparent diameter is enlarged. —4. In medical language, the passage of a fluid in the living body into vessels not destined to receive it; the termination of a fluid to a part different from that to which it is ordinarily directed; as in vicarious hæmorrhage. It is also used frequently to signify alienation of the mind.
ABER'RING, part. a. Wandering; going astray.
ABERRUN'CATE,† v. t. [L. averrunco.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly.
ABET', v. t. [Sax. betan, gebetan; properly to push forward, to advance; hence to amend, to revive, to restore, to make better; and applied to fire, to increase the flame, to excite, to promote. Hence to aid by encouraging or instigating. Hence in Saxon, Nabete nan man the fyr; Let no man bet (better, excite) the fire.]—1. To encourage by aid or countenance, but now used chiefly in a bad sense.—2. In law, to encourage, counsel, incite, or assist in a criminal act.
ABET',† n. The act of aiding or encouraging in a crime.
ABET'MENT, n. The act of abetting.
ABET'TED, pp. Incited, aided, encouraged to a crime.
ABET'TING, ppr. Counselling, aiding, or encouraging to a crime. In Scotch law a person is said to be abetting, who protects a criminal, conceals him from justice, or aids him in making his escape.
ABET'TOR, n. One who abets, or incites, aids or encourages another to commit a crime.
ABEVACUA'TION, n. [ab and evacuation.] In med. a partial evacuation of morbid humours of the body, either by nature or art.
ABEY'ANCE, n. pron. abáyance. [Norm. abbaiaunce or abaizance, in expectation; boyance, expectation. Qu. Fr. bayer, to gape, to look a long time with the mouth open; to stand looking in a silly manner; It. badare, to amuse one's self, to stand trifling; "tenere a bada," to keep at bay; "star a bada," to stand trifling.] In expectation or contemplation of law. The fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is in abeyance, when there is no person in being in whom it can vest; so that it is in a state of expectancy or waiting until a proper person shall appear. Thus if land is leased to a man for life, remainder to another for years, the remainder for years is in abeyance, till the death of the lessee, for life. Titles of honour and dignities are said to be in abeyance, when it is uncertain who shall enjoy them; as when a nobleman holding his dignity descendible to his heirs general, dies, leaving daughters, the king by his prerogative may grant the dignity to which of the daughters he pleases, or on the male issue of one of such daughters. During the time the title to the dignity is thus in suspension, it is said to be in abeyance.
AB'GREGATE,† v. t. [L. abgrego, ab and grex.] To separate from a herd.
ABGREGA'TION,† n. Separation from a herd or flock.
AB'HAL, n. A fruit well-known throughout Asia, it is the produce of a species of cypress, and is believed to be a powerful emenagogue.
ABHOR', v. t. [L. abhorreo, of ab and horreo, to set up bristles, shiver or shake; to look terrible.]—1. To hate extremely, or with contempt; to loath, detest, or abominate. 2. To despise or neglect; Psal. xxii. 24; Amos vi. 8.—3. To cast off or reject; Psal. lxxxix. 38.

ABHOR'RED, pp. Hated extremely, detested.

ABHOR'RENCE, } n. Extreme hatred,
ABHOR'RENCY, } detestation, great aversion.

ABHOR'RENT, a. Hating, detesting, struck with abhorrence.—2. Contrary, odious, inconsistent with, expressive of extreme opposition, as "Slander is abhorrent to all ideas of justice." In this sense, it should be always followed by to—abhorrent from is not agreeable to the English idiom.

ABHOR'RENTLY, adv. With abhorrence.

ABHOR'RER, n. One who abhors.

ABHOR'RING, ppr. Having great aversion, detesting. As a noun, it is used in Isaiah lxvi. for the object of hatred—"An abhorring to all flesh."

A'BIB, n. [Heb. אב. ab, swelling, protuberant. Ch. אבב. abub, to produce the first or early fruit; אביב. abib, a full grown ear of corn.] The first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, called also Nisan. It begins at the spring equinox, and answers to the latter part of March and beginning of April. Its name is derived from the full growth of wheat in Egypt, which took place anciently, as it does now, at that season.

ABIDE, v. i. pret. and part. abode. [Ar. abada, to be, or exist, to continue; W. bod, to be; Sax. bidan, abidan.] 1. To rest, or dwell; Gen. xxix. 19.—2. To tarry or stay for a short time; Gen. xxiv. 55.—3. To continue permanently or in the same state; to be firm and immovable; Psal. cxix. 90.—4. To remain, to continue; Acts xxvii. 31; Eccles. viii. 15.

ABIDE, v. t. To wait for; to be prepared for; to await.

Bonds and afflictions abide me; Acts xx. 23. [For is here understood.]

2. To endure or sustain.

To abide the indignation of the Lord; Joel ii. 11.

3. To bear or endure; to bear patiently, as, "I cannot abide his impertinence." This verb when intransitive, is followed by in or at before the place, and with before the person; Abide with me—at Jerusalem, or in this land. Sometimes by on; The sword shall abide on his cities. And in the sense of wait, by for; Abide for me; Hosea iii. 3. Sometimes by by; Abide by the crib; Job xxxix. In general, abide by signifies to adhere to, maintain, defend, or stand to; as, to abide by a promise, or by a friend; or to suffer the consequences, as, to abide by the event, that is, to be fixed or permanent in a particular condition.

ABIDER, n. One who dwells or continues.

ABIDING, ppr. Dwelling; remaining; continuing; enduring; awaiting.

Abiding by, is a technical term in Scotch law, signifying a judicial step in a process of reduction. Where a deed is challenged as forged, the party founding on the deed must appear in court and abide by it.

ABIDING, n. Continuance; fixed state; residence; an enduring.

ABIDING, a. Continuing, permanent.

ABIDINGLY, adv. In a manner to continue; permanently.

AB'IES, n. [L.] In bot., (the fir), a genus of trees of the coniferous tribe, well known for the valuable timber that is produced by many of the species. It was formerly considered a part of the genus Pinus itself, but modern botanists have distinguished it. The English name fir-wood, comes from the Sax. furh-wudu.

ABIETI'NÆ, n. A division in the natural order of coniferous plants, comprehending the true firs, pines, and araucaria-like pines, all which have cones with many rows of scales, in which the seeds are formed.

ABIG'EAT, n. [Lat. abigeatus.] The crime of stealing or driving off cattle in droves, otherwise called abactus.

ABIL'ITY, n. [Fr. habileté; L. habilitas, ableness, fitness, from habeo, to have or hold.] 1. Physical power, whether bodily or mental; natural or acquired; force of understanding; skill in arts or science. Ability is active power, or power to perform; as opposed to capacity, or power to receive. In the plural, abilities is much used in a like sense; and also for faculties of the mind, and acquired qualifications.—2. Riches, wealth, substance, which are the means, or which furnish the power, of doing certain acts.

They gave according to their ability to the work; Ezra ii.

—3. Moral power, depending on the will —a metaphysical and theological sense. 4. Civil or legal power; the power or right to do certain things; as, an ability to transfer property or dispose of effects—ability to inherit. It is opposed to disability.

Ab initio, [L.] From the beginning.

ABORT',† n. An abortion.

ABOR'TION, n. [L. abortio, a miscarriage; usually deduced from ab and orior.]—1. The act of miscarrying, or producing young before the natural time, or before the fœtus is perfectly formed.—2. In a figurative sense, any fruit or produce that does not come to maturity, or any thing which fails in its progress, before it is matured or perfect, as a design or project—3. The fœtus brought forth before it is perfectly formed. When the fœtus is brought forth before the end of the sixth month, the accident is termed an abortion or miscarriage; but if after the sixth month, it is called premature labour.

ABORT'IVE, a. Brought forth in an immature state; failing, or coming to naught, before it is complete.—2. Failing in its effect; miscarrying; producing nothing; as, an abortive scheme.—3. Rendering abortive; as, abortive gulf, in Milton, but not legitimate.—4. Pertaining to abortion; as, abortive vellum, made of the skin of an abortive calf.—5. In bot., abortive or barren flowers are generally such as have stamens but no pistils.

ABORT'IVE, n. That which is brought forth or born prematurely.

ABORT'IVELY, adv. Immaturely; in an untimely manner.

ABORT'IVENESS, n. The state of being abortive; a failing in the progress to perfection or maturity; a failure of producing the intended effect.

ABORT'MENT, n. An untimely birth.

ABOUND', v. i. [L. abundo; Fr. abonder; If this word is from L. unda, a wave, the latter has probably lost its first consonant. Abound may naturally be deduced from the Celtic. W. fyniaw, to produce, to generate, to abound, from fwn, a source, the root of fynon, L. fons, a fountain. Or it may be connected with L. bonus, in the sense of extending, enlargement.]—1. To have or possess in great quantity; to be copiously supplied; followed by with or in; as, to abound with provisions; to abound in good things.—2. To be in great plenty; to be very prevalent.

Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; Rom. v.

ABOUND'ING, ppr. Having in great plenty; being in great plenty; being very prevalent; generally prevailing.

ABOUND'ING, n. Increase.

He went out about the third hour; Mat. xxi. 3.

4. Near to in action, or near to the performance of some act.

Paul was about to open his mouth; Acts xviii. 14.

5. Near to the person; appended to the clothes. Every thing about him is in order. Is your snuff-box about you? From nearness on all sides, the transition is easy to, a concern with. Hence, 6.—Concerned in, engaged in, relating to, respecting; as, what is he about ?

I must be about my Father's business; Luke ii. 49.

7. In compass or circumference; two yards about the stem.—8. Near to in number or quantity.

There fell that day about three thousand men; Ex. xxxii.

ABOUT', adv. Near to in quality or degree; as, about as high, or as cold.—2. Here and there; around; in one place and another.

Wandering about from house to house; 1 Tim. v.

3. Round, or the longest way, opposed to across, or the shortest way; as a mile about, and half a mile across. To bring about, to bring to the end; to effect or accomplish a purpose. To come about, to change or turn; to come to the desired point. In a like sense, seamen say go about, when a ship changes her course to go on the other tack. Ready about, about ship, are orders for tacking. To go about, signifies to enter upon; also to prepare; to seek the means.

Why go ye about to kill me? John vii.

ABÖVE, prep. [Sax. abufan, bufan, bufon.] 1. Literally, higher in place.

ABRÖACH, adv. [See BROACH.] Broached; letting out or yielding liquor, or in a posture for letting out; as, a cask is abroach. Figuratively used by Shakspeare for setting loose, or in a state of being diffused, "Set mischief abroach;" but this sense is unusual.

ABROAD, (abrawd') adv. [See BROAD.] In a general sense, at large; widely; not confined to narrow limits. Hence, 1. In the open air.—2. Beyond or out of the walls of a house, as to walk abroad.—3. Beyond the limits of a camp; Deut. xxiii. 10. 4. Beyond the bounds of a country; in foreign countries; as, to go abroad for an education; We have broils at home and enemies abroad.—5. Extensively; before the public at large.

He began to blaze abroad the matter; Mark i. 45; Esther i.

6. Widely; with expansion; as, a tree spreads its branches abroad.

AB'ROGATE, v. t. [L. abrogo, to repeal; from ab and rogo, to ask or propose. See the English reach.] To repeal; to annul by an authoritative act; to abolish by the authority of the maker or his successor; applied to the repeal of laws, decrees, ordinances, the abolition of established customs, &c.

AB'ROGATED, pp. Repealed; annulled by an act of authority.

AB'ROGATING, ppr. Repealing by authority; making void.

ABROGA'TION, n. The act of abrogating; repeal by authority of the legislative power.

ABROOD',† adv. [See BROOD.] In the action of brooding.

ABROOD'ING,† n. A sitting abrood.

ABROOK',† v. t. To brook, to endure. [See BROOK.]

ABROTANOID', n. [Gr. αβροτονον, and ειδος, form.] A species of perforated coral or madrepore growing on rocks on the bottom of the sea.

ABRO'TANUM, n. [Gr. αβροτονον.] A species of evergreen plant, arranged under the genus Artemisia,—called also southernwood. It belongs to the natural order of composite plants. It has sometimes been used as a vermifuge.

ABRUPT', a. [L. abruptus, from abrumpo, to break off, of ab and rumpo. See RUPTURE.] 1. Literally, broken off, or broken short. Hence,—2. Steep; craggy; applied to rocks, precipices, and the like.—3. Figuratively, sudden; without notice to prepare the mind for the event; as, an abrupt entrance or address.—4. Unconnected; having sudden transitions from one subject to another; as, an abrupt style.—5. In bot., an abrupt pinnate leaf is one which has neither leaflet, nor tendril at the end. Abrupt leaf, one that has its extremity cut off as it were by a transverse line. Abrupt root, one fleshy and terminating abruptly, as if the lower part had been cut off.

Abrupt root.

ABRUPT,' n. A chasm or gulph with steep sides.

Over the vast abrupt. Milton.

[This use of the word is infrequent.]

ABRUP'TED, a. Torn off; torn asunder.

ABRUP'TION, n. A sudden breaking off; a violent separation of bodies.

ABRUPT'LY, adv. Suddenly; without giving notice, or without the usual forms; as, the Minister left France abruptly.

ABRUPT'NESS, n. A state of being broken; craggedness; steepness.—2. Figuratively, suddenness; unceremonious haste or vehemence.

AB'SCESS, n. [L. abscessus, from ab and cedo, to go from.] An imposthume. A collection of morbid matter or pus, in the cellular or adipose membrane; matter generated by the suppuration of an inflammatory tumour.

ABSCIND', v. t. [L. abscindo.] To cut off. [Lit. us.]

AB'SCISS, ABSCIS'SA, n. [L. abscissus, from ab and scindo, to cut; Gr. σχιζω. [See SCISSORS.] In conics, a part of the diameter, or transverse axis of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex, or some other fixed point, and a semiordinate. Thus, in the parabolic figure BCA, the part of the axis DC intercepted between the semiordinate BD, and the vertex C, is an abscissa.

Applicate Ordinate.

ABSCIS''SION, n. [See ABSCISS.] 1. A cutting off, or a being cut off. In surg., the separation of any corrupted or useless part of the body, by a sharp instrument; applied to the soft parts, as amputation is to the bones and flesh of a limb.—2. In rhet., a figure of speech, when having begun to say a thing, a speaker stops abruptly, as supposing the matter sufficiently understood. Thus, "He is a man of so much honour, and candour, and such generosity—but I need say no more."

ABSCOND', v. i. [L. abscondo, to hide, of abs and condo, to hide, i. e. to withdraw, or to thrust aside or into a corner or secret place.] 1. To retire from public view, or from the place in which one resides or is ordinarily to be found; to withdraw, or absent one's self in a private manner; to be concealed; appropriately used of persons who secrete themselves to avoid a legal process.—2. To hide, withdraw, or be concealed.

The marmot absconds in winter. Ray.

ABSCOND'ER, n. One who withdraws from public notice, or conceals himself from public view.

ABSCOND'ING, ppr. and a. Withdrawing privately from public view; as, an absconding debtor, who confines himself to his apartments, or absents himself to avoid the ministers of justice. In the latter sense, it is properly an adjective.

ABSCON'SIO, n. [L. abscondo.] In anat., a cavity of a bone which receives and conceals the head of another bone.

AB'SENCE, n. [L. absens, from absum, abesse, to be away; ab and sum.] 1. A state of being at a distance in place, or not in company. It is used to denote any distance indefinitely, either in the same town, or country, or in a foreign country; and primarily supposes a prior presence; as, "speak well of one in his absence."—2. Want; destitution; implying no previous presence.

In the absence of conventional law. Ch. Kent.

3. In law, non-appearance; a not being in court to answer.—4. Heedlessness; inattention to things present. Absence of mind is the attention of the mind to a subject which does not occupy the rest of the company, and which draws the mind from things or objects which are present, to others distant or foreign. In Scotch law, a decree is said to be in absence when no appearance is made for the defender.

AB'SENT, a. Not present; not in company; at such a distance as to prevent communication. It is used also for being in a foreign country; as, a gentleman is absent on his travels.

Absent from one another; Gen. xxxi. 49.

2. Heedless; inattentive to persons present, or to subjects of conversation in company; as, an absent man is uncivil to the company.—3. In familiar language, not at home; as, the master of the house is absent. In other words, he does not wish to be disturbed by company.

ABSENT', v. t. To depart to such a distance as to prevent intercourse; to retire or withdraw; to forbear to appear in presence; used with the reciprocal pronoun; as, let a man absent himself from the company.

ABSENT'ED, pp. Retired, or withdrawn.

ABSENTEE', n. One who withdraws from his country, office, or estate; one who removes to a distant place, or to another country. It is a term applied generally by way of reproach to landlords and capitalists, who, deriving their income from one country, reside in another country, in which they expend their property.

ABSENT'EEISM, n. The practice of being abroad, or away from one's country, station, or estate.

ABSENT'ER, n. One who absents himself.

ABSENT'ING, ppr. Departing; withdrawing.

ABSENT'MENT, n. A state of being absent.

ABSIN'THIAN, a. [from absinthium.] Of the nature of wormwood.

ABSIN'THIATED, a. Impregnated with wormwood.

ABSIN'THIUM, n. [Gr. αψινθιον; Per. afsinthin; the same in Chaldaic. Budæus in his commentaries on Theophrast, supposes the word composed of α priv. and ψινθος, delight, so named from its bitterness. But it may be an Oriental word.] The common wormwood; a bitter plant, used as a tonic. A species of Artemisia.

AB'SIS. In astr. [See APSIS.]

AB'SOLUTE, a. [L. absolutus. See ABSOLVE.] 1. Literally, in a general sense, free, independent of any thing extraneous. Hence,—2. Complete in itself; positive; as, an absolute declaration.—3. Unconditional; as, an absolute promise.—4. Existing independent of any other cause; as, God is absolute.—5. Unlimited by extraneous power or control; as, an absolute government or prince.—6. Not relative; as absolute space. In gram., the case absolute is when a word or member of a sentence is not immediately dependent in government on the other parts of the sentence. —Absolute equation, in astr., is the sum of the optic and eccentric equations. The apparent inequality of a planet's motion in its orbit, arising from its unequal distances from the earth at different times, is called its optic equation; this would subsist, if the planet's real motion was uniform. The eccentric inequality is caused by the planet's motion not being uniform.—Absolute term or number, in alge., is that which is completely known, and to which all the other part of an equation is made equal; thus, in the equation $x^2 + 12x = 24$, the absolute term is 24.—Absolute time, that which flows equally in itself without relation to any thing external, as duration.—Absolute space is space considered without relation to material objects.—Absolute motion is the absolute change of place in a moving body, independent of any other motion whatever. It is often applied, however, to motion considered in regard to some fixed point upon the earth —Absolute gravity is that by which a body descends freely and perpendicularly in a vacuum or non-resisting medium; or it may be considered as the whole force with which a body is impelled toward the centre, without regard to modifying circumstances.—Absolute in law, signifies without condition or encumbrance; as, an absolute bond, in distinction from a conditional bond.—Absolute disposition in Scots law, is a conveyance unqualified by any burden or reservation in favour of the granter, or any other person, in contradistinction to a conveyance containing in gremio a power of reversion, or any other reservation.

AB'SOLUTELY, adv. Completely, wholly; as, a thing is absolutely unintelligible.—2. Without dependence or relation; in a state unconnected.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve, either willingness to live, or forwardness to die. Hooker.

3. Without restriction or limitation; as, God reigns absolutely.—4. Without condition, as, God does not forgive absolutely, but upon condition of faith and repentance.—5. Positively, peremptorily; as,

Command me absolutely not to go. Milton.

AB'SOLUTENESS, n. Independence; completeness in itself. 2. Despotic authority, or that which is subject to no extraneous restriction or control.

ABSOLU'TION, n. In the civil law, an acquittal or sentence of a judge declaring an accused person innocent. In the canon law, a remission of sins pronounced by a priest in favour of a penitent.—Among protestants, a sentence by which an excommunicated person is released from his liability to punishment.

AB'SOLUTISM, n. State of being absolute, or principles of absolute government.—2. Doctrine of predestination.

AB'SOLUTORY, a. Absolving; that absolves.

ABSOLV'ATORY, a. [from absolve.] Containing absolution, pardon, or release; having power to absolve.

ABSOLVE', v. t. (abzolv'.) [L. absolvo, from ab and solvo, to loose or release; Ch. שלח, shalah, to absolve, to finish; Heb. של, shal, to loose or loosen. See SOLVE.] To set free or release from some obligation, debt, or responsibility; or from that which subjects a person to a burden or penalty; as, to absolve a person from a promise; to absolve an offender, which amounts to an acquittal and remission of his punishment. Hence, in the civil law, the word was used for acquit; and in the canon law, for forgive, or a sentence of remission. In ordinary language, its sense is, to set free or release from an engagement. Formerly, good writers used the word in the sense of finish, accomplish; as, to absolve work, in Milton; but, in this sense, it seems to be obsolete.

ABSOLV'ED, pp. Released; acquitted; remitted; declared innocent.

ABSOLV'ER, n. One who absolves; also one that pronounces sin to be remitted.

ABSOLV'ING, ppr. Setting free from a debt or charge; acquitting; remitting.

AB'SONANT, a. [See ABSONOUS.] Wide from the purpose; contrary to reason.

AB'SONOUS, a. [L. absonus; ab and sonus, sound.] Unmusical, or untunable.

ABSORB', v. t. [L. absorbeo, ab and sorbeo, to drink in; Ar. sharaba; Rab. שרף, sharap, to draw or drink in; whence sirup, sherbet, shrub.] 1. To drink in; to suck up; to imbibe; as a sponge, or as the lacteals of the body.—2. To drink in, swallow up, or overwhelm with water, as a body in a whirlpool.—3. To waste wholly or sink in expenses; to exhaust; as, to absorb an estate in luxury.—4. To engross or engage wholly; as, absorbed in study or the pursuit of wealth.

ABSORBABIL'ITY, n. A state or quality of being absorbable.

ABSORB'ABLE, a. That may be imbibed or swallowed.

ABSORB'ED, or ABSORBT', pp. Imbibed; swallowed; wasted; engaged; lost in study; wholly engrossed.

ABSORB'ENT, a. Imbibing; swallowing.—Absorbent system. The absorbent system is composed of the absorbent vessels and conglobate glands; the former are divided into lymphatics and lacteals, and the thoracic duct or common trunk in which they terminate. [See the NOUN.]

ABSORB'ENT, n. In anat., a vessel which imbibes. 1. The small delicate transparent vessels which take up substance from the surface of the body or from any cavity, and carry it into the blood, are termed absorbents or absorbent vessels. They are denominated, according to the liquids which they convey, lacteals or lymphatics.—2. In phar., medicines which destroy acidities in the stomach and bowels are called absorbents; as, magnesia, prepared chalk, oyster-shells, crab's claws, &c.—3. In chem., this term is applied to substances which have the power of withdrawing moisture from the atmosphere, or of neutralizing acids; as, the earths, alumina, magnesia, &c. Absorbent grounds in paint., are picture grounds prepared either on board or canvass, so as to have the power of drying up or imbibing the redundant oil from the colours, for the sake of expedition, or to increase the brilliancy of the colours.

ABSORB'ING, ppr. or a. Imbibing, engrossing; wasting.

ABSORP'TION, n. The act or process of imbibing or swallowing; either by water which overwhelms, or by substances which drink in and retain liquids; as, the absorption of a body in a whirlpool, or of water by the earth; or of the humours of the body by certain medicines; or of substances into the mass of circulating fluids in the animal body, by means of absorbent vessels. It is used also to express the swallowing up of substances by the earth in chasms made by earthquakes, and the sinking of large tracts in violent commotions of the earth.—2. In chem., the conversion of a gaseous fluid into a liquid or solid, by union with another substance.

ABSORP'TIVE, a. Having power to imbibe.

Absque hoc, [L.] without this or that; in law, words used in traversing what has been alleged, and is repeated.

ABSTAIN, v. i. [L. abstineo, to keep from; abs and teneo, to hold. See TENANT.] In a general sense, to forbear or refrain from, voluntarily; but used chiefly to denote a restraint upon the passions or appetites; to refrain from indulgence; as to abstain from the use of ardent spirits; to abstain from luxuries.

Abstain from meats offered to idols. Acts xv.

ABSTE'MIOUS, a. [L. abstemius; from abs and temetum, an ancient name of strong wine, according to Fabius and Gellius. But Vossius supposes it to be from abstineo, by a change of n to m. It may be from the root of timeo, to fear, that is, to withdraw.] 1. Sparing in diet; refraining from a free use of food and strong drinks.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious. Arbuthnot

2. Sparing in the enjoyment of animal pleasures of any kind. [This sense is less common and perhaps not legitimate.]—3. Sparingly used, or used with temperance; belonging to abstinence: as, an abstemious diet; an abstemious life.

ABSTE'MIOUSLY, adv. Temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

ABSTE'MIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being temperate or sparing in the use of food and strong drinks. This word expresses a greater degree of abstinence than temperance.

ABSTEN'TION, n. [Lat. abstentio.] In law, the act of holding off or preventing the heir from taking possession.

ABSTEN'TION, n. The act of restraining.

ABSTERĠE, v. t. (absterj'). [L. abstergeo, of abs and tergeo, to wipe.] To wipe, or make clean by wiping; to cleanse by resolving obstructions in the body. [Used chiefly as a medical term.]

ABSTERĠ'ENT, a. Wiping; cleansing.

ABSTERĠ'ENT, n. A medicine which frees the body from obstructions, as soap; but the use of the word is nearly superseded by detergent, which see.

ABSTER'SION, n. [from L. abstergeo, abstersus.] The act of wiping clean; or a cleansing by medicines which resolve obstructions. [See DETERGE, DETERSION.]

ABSTER'SIVE, a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing obstructions. [See DETERSIVE.]

AB'STINENCE, n. [L. abstinentia. See ABSTAIN.] In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from, or forbearing any action.

Abstinence from every thing which can be deemed labour. Paley's Philos.

More appropriately, 2. The refraining from an indulgence of appetite, or from customary gratifications of animal propensities. It denotes a total forbearance, as in fasting, or a forbearance of the usual quantity. In the latter sense, it may coincide with temperance. In general, it denotes a more sparing use of enjoyments than temperance. Besides abstinence implies previous free indulgence; temperance does not. Of late years, both terms have been employed to signify a total forbearance from the use of ardent spirits.

AB'STINENT, a. Refraining from indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink.

AB'STINENTLY, adv. With abstinence.

AB'STINENTS, a sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century, who opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.

ABSTORT'ED, a. Forced away.

ABSTRACT', v. t. [L. abstraho, to draw from or separate; from abs and traho, which is the Eng. draw. See DRAW.] 1. To draw from, or to separate; as, to abstract an action from its evil effects; to abstract spirit from any substance by distillation; but in this sense extract is now more generally used.—2. To separate ideas by the operation of the mind; to consider one part of a complex object, or to have a partial idea of it in the mind.—3. To select or separate the substance of a book or writing; to epitomize or reduce to a summary.—4. In chem., to separate, as the more volatile parts of a substance by repeated distillation, or at least by distillation.

AB'STRACT, a. [L. abstractus.] Separate; distinct from something else. An abstract idea, in meta., is an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it, as the solidity of marble contemplated apart from its colour or figure.

Abstract terms are those which express abstract ideas, as beauty, whiteness, roundness, without regarding any subject in which they exist; or abstract terms are the names of orders, genera, or species of things, in which there is a combination of similar qualities.

Abstract or pure mathematics, is that which treats of the properties of magnitude, figure, or quantity, absolutely and generally considered, without restriction to any particular object, such as arithmetic and geometry. Abstract mathematics is thus distinguished from mixed mathematics, in which simple and abstract quantities previously considered in the former, are applied to particular sensible objects, as astronomy, mechanics, optics, &c Abstract numbers are assemblages of units considered independently of any thing or things that they might otherwise be supposed to represent. For example, 5 is an abstract number while it remains independent; but if we say 5 feet or 5 miles, it is no longer an abstract but a concrete number.—2. Separate, existing in the mind only; as, an abstract subject; an abstract question; and hence, difficult, abstruse.

AB'STRACT, n. A summary, or epitome, containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a treatise or writing. 2. Formerly, an extract, or a smaller quantity, containing the essence of a larger. In the abstract, in a state of separation, as a subject considered in the abstract, i. e. without reference to particular persons or things.

ABSTRACT'ED, pp. Separated; refined; exalted; abstruse; absent in mind.

ABSTRACT'EDLY, adv. In a separate state, or in contemplation only.

ABSTRACT'EDNESS, n. The state of being abstracted.

ABSTRACT'ER, n. One who makes an abstract or summary.

ABSTRACT'ING, ppr. Separating; making a summary.

ABSTRAC'TION, n. The act of separating, or state of being separated.—2. The operation of the mind when occupied by abstract ideas; as, when we contemplate some particular part, or property of a complex object, as separate from the rest. Thus, when the mind considers the branch of a tree by itself, or the colour of the leaves, as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So also, when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects. The power which the understanding has of separating the combinations which are presented to it, is distinguished by logicians, by the name of abstraction. Abstraction is the ground-work of classification, by which things are arranged in orders, genera, and species. We separate in idea the qualities of certain objects which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class, or collected body. —3. A separation from worldly objects; a recluse life; as a hermit's abstraction.—4. Absence of mind; inattention to present objects.—5. In the process of distillation, the term is used to denote the separation of the volatile parts, which rise, come over, and are condensed in a receiver, from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used when a fluid is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort, and distilled off, to change its state, or the nature of its composition.

ABSTRACT'IVE, a. Having the power or quality of abstracting.

ABSTRACT'IVE, ABSTRACTI''TIOUS, } a. Abstracted, or drawn from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation.

AB'STRACTLY, adv. Separately; absolutely; in a state or manner unconnected with any thing else, as matter abstractly considered.

AB'STRACTNESS, n. A separate state: a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object.

ABSTRINGE, v. t. To unbind.

ABSTRUDE,† v. t. [Infra.] To thrust or pull away.

ABSTRUSE, a. [L. abstrusus, from abstrudo, to thrust away, to conceal; abs and trudo; Eng. to thrust.] Hid; concealed; hence remote from apprehension; difficult to be comprehended or understood; opposed to what is obvious. [Not used of material objects.]

Metaphysics is an abstruse science.

ABSTRUSELY, adv. In a concealed manner; obscurely; in a manner not to be easily understood.

ABSTRUSENESS, n. Obscurity of meaning; the state or quality of being difficult to be understood.

ABSTRU'SITY, n. Abstruseness, that which is abstruse.

ABSUME, v. t. To bring to an end by a gradual waste.

ABSURD', a. [L. absurdus, from ab and surdus, deaf, insensible.] Opposed to manifest truth; inconsistent with reason, or the plain dictates of common sense. An absurd man acts contrary to the clear dictates of reason or sound judgment. An absurd proposition contradicts obvious truth. An absurd practice or opinion is repugnant to the reason or common apprehension of men. It is absurd to say, six and six make ten, or that plants will take root in stone. Reductio ad absurdum, reducing to an absurdity, is a species of argument which proves not the thing asserted, but the absurdity of everything which contradicts it. It is much used in geometry, in order to demonstrate the converse of a proposition already proved. In this way the proposition is not proved in a direct manner by principles before laid down, but it is shown that the contrary is absurd or impossible; and thus the truth of the proposition is demonstrated indirectly. This method of demonstration is also frequently termed indirect, in contradistinction to the ordinary or direct method.

ABSURD'ITY, n. The quality of being inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment. Want of judgment, applied to men; want of propriety, applied to things.—2. That which is absurd: in this sense it has a plural; the absurdities of men.

ABSURD'LY, adv. In a manner inconsistent with reason, or obvious propriety.

ABSURD'NESS, n. The same as absurdity, and less used.

ABUND'ANCE, n. [F. abondance. See ABOUND.] Great plenty; an overflowing quantity; ample sufficiency; in strictness, applicable to quantity only; but customarily used of number; as, an abundance of peasants. It denotes also fullness, overflowing; as, the abundance of the heart, Mat. xii.; Luke vi.

ABUND'ANT, a. Plentiful; in great quantity; fully sufficient; as, an abundant supply. In Scripture, abounding; having in great quantity; overflowing with.

The Lord God is abundant in goodness and truth, Ex. xxxiv.

Abundant number in arithmetic, is one, the sum of whose aliquot parts exceeds the number itself. Thus, 12 is an abundant number, for the sum of its aliquot parts $1+2+3+4+6=16$. It is thus distinguished from a perfect number, which is equal to the sum of all its aliquot parts, and from a deficient number, which is less than the sum of all its aliquot parts.

ABUND'ANTLY, adv. Fully; amply; plentifully; in a sufficient degree.

ABU'SAGE,† n. Abuse.

ABUSE, v. t. (s as z.) [Fr. abuser; L. abutor, abusus, of ab and utor, to use. See USE.] 1. To use ill; to maltreat; to misuse; to use with bad motives or to wrong purposes; as, to abuse rights or privileges.

They that use this world as not abusing it, 1 Cor. vii.

2. To violate; to defile by improper sexual intercourse.—3. To deceive; to impose on.

Nor be with all these tempting words abused. — Pope.

4. To treat rudely, or with reproachful language; to revile.

He mocked and abused them shamefully. — Mac.

5. To pervert the meaning of; to misapply; as, to abuse words.

ABUSE, n. Ill use; improper treatment or employment; application to a wrong purpose; as, an abuse of our natural powers; an abuse of civil rights, or of religious privileges; abuse of advantages, &c.—2. A corrupt practice or custom; as, the abuses of government. —3. Rude speech; reproachful language addressed to a person; contumely; reviling words.—4. Seduction.

After the abuse he forsook me. — Sydney.

5. Perversion of meaning; improper use or application; as, an abuse of words.

ABUSED, pp. (s as z.) Ill-used; used to a bad purpose; treated with rude language; misemployed; perverted to bad or wrong ends; deceived; defiled; violated.

ABUSEFUL, a. Using or practising abuse; abusive.

ABUSER, n. (s as z.) One who abuses, in speech or behaviour; one that deceives; a ravisher; a sodomite, 1 Cor. vi.

ABUSING, ppr. (s as z.) Using ill; employing to bad purposes; deceiving; violating the person; perverting.

ABU'SIO, n. [Lat.] In rhet., a figure of speech by which words are used with some deviation from their proper meaning.

ABU'SION, n. (abu'zhon.) Abuse; evil or corrupt usage; reproach. [Lit. us.]

ABUSIVE, a. Practising abuse; offering harsh words, or ill treatment; as, an abusive author; an abusive fellow.—2. Containing abuse, or that is the instrument of abuse; as, abusive words; rude, reproachful. In the sense of deceitful; as, an abusive treaty. [Lit. us.]

ABUSIVELY, adv. In an abusive manner; rudely; reproachfully.

ABUSIVENESS, n. Ill-usage; the quality of being abusive; rudeness of language, or violence to the person.

ABUT', v. i. [Fr. aboutir, from bout, an end.] To border upon; to be contiguous to; to meet; in strictness, to adjoin to at the end; but this distinction has not always been observed. The word is chiefly used in describing the bounds or situation of land; and in popular language is contracted into but; as, butted and bounded.

ABUT'MENT, n. The head or end; that which unites one end of a thing to another; chiefly used to denote the solid pier or mound of earth, stone, or timber, which is erected on the bank of a river to support the end of a bridge and connect it with the land.—2. That which abuts or borders on another.

ABUT'TAL, n. The butting or boundary of land at the end; a head-land. The sides or the breadths of lands are more properly described as adjacent or bordering; and the ends in length, as abutting or bounding.

AB'VOLATE, v. t. To fly from.

ABVOLA'TION, n. The act of flying from.

ABY',† v. t. or i. [Probably contracted from abide.] To endure; to pay dearly; to remain.

ABYSM', n. (abyzm'.) Old Fr.; now abime. [See ABYSS.] A gulf.

ABYS'MAL, a. Pertaining to an abyss.

ABYSS, n. [Gr. ἄβυσσος, bottomless, from α priv. and βυσσος, bottom, Ion. for βυθος. See BOTTOM.] A bottomless gulf; used also for a deep mass of waters, supposed by some to have encompassed the earth before the flood.

> Darkness was upon the face of the deep, or abyss, as it is in the Septuagint; Gen. i. 2.

The word is also used for an immense cavern in the earth, in which God is supposed to have collected all the waters on the third day of the creation. It is used also for hell, Erebus.—2. That which is immeasurable; that in which any thing is lost.

> Thy throne is darkness, in the abyss of light. Milton.

3. In antiq., the temple of Proserpine, so called from the immense treasures it was supposed to contain.—4. In her., the centre of an escutcheon.

> He bears azure, a fleur de lis, in abyss.

ABYSSIN'IAN, a. [Ar. habashon, Abyssinians, Ethiopians, from habasha, to collect or congregate.] 1. A name denoting a mixed multitude or a black race.—2. Belonging to Abyssinia.

ABYSSIN'IANS, n. A sect of Christians in Abyssinia, who admit but one nature in Jesus Christ, and reject the council of Chalcedon. They are governed by a bishop, or metropolitan, called Abuna, who is appointed by the Coptic patriarch of Cairo.

A. C. An abbreviation of Ante Christum, before Christ; used in chronology, as A.C. 600, signifying 600 years before the birth of Christ.

AC, in Saxon oak; the initial syllable of names; as, Acton, oaktown.

ACAC'ALOT,
AC'ALOT, } n. A Mexican fowl, the Tantalus Mexicanus, or Corvus aquaticus, water raven. [See ACALOT.]

ACA'CIA, n. [L. acacia, a thorn, from Gr. ακη, a point.] Egyptian thorn, a species of plant ranked by Linnæus under the genus Mimosa, and by others, made a distinct genus. Acacia among the moderns, a very extensive genus of trees or shrubby plants inhabiting the tropical parts of both the Old and New World. Nearly 300 species of the acacia are known.

Acacia, in med., is a name given to the inspissated juice of the unripe fruit of the Mimosa nilotica, which is brought from Egypt in roundish masses in bladders.

Acacia, among antiquaries, is a name given to something like a roll or bag, seen on medals. Some take it to represent a handkerchief rolled up, with which signals were given at the games; others, a roll of petitions; and some, a purple bag of earth, to remind them of their mortality.

ACA'CIANS, in church history, were certain sects, so denominated from their leaders, Acacius, bishop of Cesarea, and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople.

ACADEME,† n. An academy; a society of persons.

ACADE'MIAL, a. Pertaining to an academy.

ACADE'MIAN, n. A member of an academy; a student in a university or college.

ACADEM'IC, n. One who belonged to the school, or adhered to the philosophy of Socrates and Plato. The latter is considered as the founder of the academic philosophy in Greece. He taught that matter is eternal and infinite, but without form, refractory, and tending to disorder; and that there is an intelligent cause, the author of spiritual being, and of the material world.

ACADEM'ICALLY, adv. In an academical manner.

ACADEMI"CIAN, n. [Fr. académicien.] A member of an academy, or society for promoting arts and sciences; particularly, a member of the French academies.

ACAD'EMISM, n. The doctrine of the academic philosophy.

ACAD'EMIST, n. A member of an academy for promoting arts and sciences; also, an academic philosopher.

ACAD'EMY, n. [L. academia, Gr. ακαδημια.] Originally, it is said, a garden, grove, or villa, near Athens, where Plato and his followers held their philosophical conferences. 1. A school or seminary of learning, holding a rank between a university or college, and a common school; also, a school for teaching a particular art, or particular sciences; as, a military academy.—2. A house, in which the students or members of an academy meet; a place of education.—3. A society of men united for the promotion of arts and sciences in general, or of some particular art. Academy figure, in paint., a drawing usually made with black and white chalk, on tinted paper, after the living model.

ACAL'EPHA, n. An order of marine animals. [See ACALEPHÆ.]

ACALE'PHÆ, n. [Gr. ακαληφη, a nettle.] The third class of Cuvier's zoophites. Many of them are popularly called sea-nettles, from their causing when touched, a disagreeable sensation similar to the sting of a nettle. Their form is always circular and radiated.

Acalephæ.
1. Medusa pellucens. 2. Rhizostoma Cuvieri.

AC'ALOT, n. [contracted from acacalot.] A Mexican fowl, called by some the aquatic crow. It is the ibis, or a fowl that very much resembles it.

ACA'LYCIS,
ACALY'CINOUS, } a. [Gr. α and καλυξ.] Without a calyx or flower-cup; applied to plants which have no calyx.

ACAM'ACU, n. A bird; the Brazilian fly-catcher, or todus.

ACA'MATOS, n. [Gr. α and καμνω.] A perfect rest of the muscles, or that disposition of a limb which is equally distinct from flexion and extension.

ACANA'CEOUS, a. (acana'shus.) [Gr. ακανος, a prickly shrub.] Armed with prickles. Acanaceous plants are those which are prickly, and bear their flowers and seeds on a kind of heads.

ACANTH'A, n. [Gr. ακανθα, a spine or thorn.] In bot., a prickle; in zool., a spine or prickly fin; in anat., the acute processes of the vertebræ, the spine of the tibia, or the spina dorsi. In ichthy., the prickly fins of fishes.

ACANTHA'CEOUS, a. Armed with prickles, as a plant. An epithet given to all plants of the thistle kind, on account of the prickles with which they are beset.

ACANTH'ARIS, n. [Gr. ακανθιας.] In entom., a species of cimex with a spinous thorax and a ciliated abdomen with spines, found in Jamaica.

ACANTH'INE, a. [See ACANTHUS.] Pertaining to the plant acanthus. The acanthine garments of the ancients were made of the down of thistles, or embroidered in imitation of the acanthus.

ACANTHOPTERY'GIAN, n. An acanthopterygious fish.

ACANTHOPTERY'GII, n. One of those primary grand divisions of fishes established by Cuvier. It comprehends by far the most numerous race of fishes

They are distinguished by the spines which supply the place of the first rays of their dorsal fins, or which alone support the first fin of the back, where there are two; in some species, instead of a first dorsal fin, it is represented by a few unconnected spines. The first rays of their anal fins consist of simple spines, and each ventral fin has usually one. Cuvier divides the acanthopterygious fishes into thirteen natural families. The first family (percoides), has for its type the common perch (perca). The trachinus or weever, the gudgeon, and mackerel, belong to this division.

Perch.

ACANTHOPTERYG'IOUS, a. [Gr. ακανθος, a thorn, and πτερυγιον, the fin of a fish.] In zool., having back fins which are hard, bony, and prickly; a term applied to certain fishes.

ACANTHU'RUS, n. [ακανθος, a spine, and ουρα, a tail.] (Thorntail.) A genus of acanthopterygious fishes, distinguished from proximate genera by the form of the body and tail, which are exceedingly compressed.

ACANTH'US, n. [Gr. ακανθος, L. acanthus, from ακανθα, a prickle or thorn. See ACANTHA.] 1. The plant bear's breech, or brank ursine, a genus of prickly plants of the class didynamia, and order angiospermia, and natural order acanthaceæ.—2. In arch., an ornament resembling the foliage or leaves of the acanthus; used in capitals of the Corinthian and Composite orders, and said to have been invented by Callimachus, who took the idea of the Corinthian capital from observing an acanthus surrounding a tile-covered basket which had been placed over a tomb.

ACAN'TICONE, n. See PISTACITE.

ACARN'AR, n. A bright star of the first magnitude in Fridanus.

ACATALEC'TIC, n. [Gr. ακαταληκτος, not defective at the end, of κατα and ληγω to cease; Ir. lieghim.] A verse, which has the complete number of syllables, without effect or superfluity.

ACAT'ALEPSY, n. [Gr. ακαταληψια; α and καταλαμβανω, to comprehend.] Impossibility of complete discovery or comprehension; incomprehensibility. [Lit. us.] In med., uncertainty in the diagnosis or prognosis of diseases.

ACATALEP'TIC, a. Incomprehensible.

ACAT'ECHITI, n. A Mexican bird, a species of Fringilla, of the size of the siskin.

ACATER, ACATES. See CATERER and CATES.

ACATHAR'SIA, n. [Gr.] In sur., the filth or sordes proceeding from a wound; impurity.

ACAU'LOUS, a. [L. a. priv. and caulis, Gr. καυλος, a stalk; W. kaul; D. kool, cabbage. See COLEWORT.] In bot., without the stem called caulis; as the carduus acaulis, or dwarf plume thistle.

ACCE̅DE, v. i. [L. accedo, of ad and cedo, to yield or give place, or rather to move.] To agree or assent, as to a proposition, or to terms proposed by another. Hence in a negotiation.—2. To become a party, by agreeing to the terms of a treaty, or convention.

ACCE̅DING, ppr. and a. Agreeing; assenting; becoming a party to a treaty by agreeing to the terms proposed.

ACCEL'ERATE, v. t. [L. accelero, of ad and celero, to hasten, from celer, quick; Gr. κελης; Heb. Ch. Syr. and Eth. קלל, קלח, or קל, kelel, kelch, or hel, to be light, nimble; Syr. to hasten. In Ch. and Ar. this root signifies also to be small or minute.] 1. To cause to move faster; to hasten; to quicken motion; to add to the velocity of a moving body. It implies previous motion or progression.—2. To add to natural or ordinary progression; as, to accelerate the growth of a plant, or the progress of knowledge.—3. To bring nearer in time; to shorten the time between the present time and a future event; as, to accelerate the ruin of a government; to accelerate a battle.

ACCEL'ERATED, pp. Quickened in motion; hastened in progress. Accelerated motion, in mech., is that which continually receives fresh accessions of velocity. If the accessions of velocity be always equal in equal times, the motion is said to be uniformly accelerated, as that of a heavy body descending by gravity; but if the accessions of velocity in equal times either increase or decrease, the motion is said to be variably accelerated. Accelerated force is the increased force which a body exerts in consequence of the acceleration of its motion.

ACCEL'ERATING, ppr. Hastening; increasing velocity or progression. Accelerating force is the force which produces an accelerated motion, as gravity.

ACCELERA'TION, n. The act of increasing velocity or progress; the state of being quickened in motion or action. Accelerated motion in mechanics and physics, is that which continually receives accessions of velocity; as, a falling body moves towards the earth with an acceleration of velocity. It is the opposite of retardation.

Acceleration of the moon is the increase of the moon's mean motion from the sun compared with the diurnal motion of the earth; the moon moving with a little quicker motion now than in ancient times. The diurnal acceleration of the fixed stars, is the time by which they anticipate the mean diurnal revolution of the sun, which is nearly three minutes fifty-six seconds of mean time. Acceleration of a planet, is when its real diurnal motion exceeds its mean diurnal motion.

ACCEL'ERATIVE, a. Adding to velocity; quickening progression.

ACCEL'ERATORY, a. Accelerating; quickening motion.

ACCEND', v. t. [L. accendo, to kindle; ad and candeo, caneo, to be white, canus, white; W. can, white, bright; also a song. Whence, canto, to sing, to chant; cantus, a song; Eng. cant; W. canu, to bleach or whiten, and to sing; cynnud, fuel. Hence, kindle, L. candidus, candid, white. The primary sense is, to throw, dart, or thrust: to shoot, as the rays of light. Hence, to cant, to throw. See CHANT and CANT.] To kindle; to set on fire. [The verb is not used.]

ACCENDIBIL'ITY, n. Capacity of being kindled, or of becoming inflamed.

ACCEND'IBLE, a. Capable of being inflamed or kindled.

ACCEN'SION, n. The act of kindling or setting on fire; or the state of being kindled; inflammation.

AC'CENT, n. [L. accentus, from ad and cano, cantum, to sing; W. canu; Corn. kana; Ir. canaim. See ACCEND.] 1. The modulation of the voice in reading or speaking, as practised by the ancient Greeks, which rendered their rehearsal musical. More strictly, in English,—2. A particular stress or force of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the others. Accent is of two kinds, primary and secondary; as in as'pira'tion. In uttering this word, we observe the first and third syllables are distinguished: the third by a full sound, which constitutes the primary accent; the first, by a degree of force in the voice which is less than that of the primary accent, but evidently greater than that which falls on the second and fourth syllables. When the full accent falls on a vowel, that vowel has its long sound, as in vo'cal; but when it falls on an articulation or consonant, the preceding vowel is short, as in hab'it. Accent alone regulates English verse.—3 A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation. Our ancestors borrowed from the Greek language three of these characters, the acute (´), the grave (`), and the circumflex (˜ or ˆ). In the Greek, the first shows when the voice is to be raised; the second when it is to be depressed; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound.—4. A modulation of the voice expressive of passions or sentiments.

> The tender accents of a woman's cry. Prior.

5. Manner of speaking.

> A man of plain accent.† Shak.

6. Poetically, words, language, or expressions in general.

> Words, on your wings, to heaven her accents bear,
> Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear. Dryden.

7. Accent in music, is a certain modulation or swelling of the sounds, to express some emotion or passion, either naturally by the voice, or artificially by means of instruments. Every bar or measure is divided into the accented and unaccented parts, the former being the emphatical, on which the spirit of the music depends.—8. A peculiar tone or inflection of voice.—9. In math, accents are employed, in order to avoid the confusion arising from the use of many letters in an algebraical problem or a diagram, and also on other accounts. In this way, the same letter or letters, being distinguished by accents, may be used to represent different magnitudes or quantities; thus abc and a'b'c', may stand for magnitudes as different in value as those represented by different letters.

Accent must not be confounded with emphasis, the latter being used in reference to some one word or part of a sentence, to which a speaker wishes to draw attention, by giving it a more marked pronunciation.

ACCENT', v. t. To express accent; to utter a syllable with a particular stress or modulation of the voice.—In poetry, to utter or pronounce in general. Also, to note accents by marks in writing.

ACCENT'ED, pp. Uttered with accent; marked with accent.

ACCENT'ING, ppr. Pronouncing or marking with accent.

ACCENT'OR, n. In music, one that sings the leading part.

ACCENT'UAL, a. Pertaining to accent.

ACCENT'UATE, v. t. To mark or pronounce with an accent, or with accents.

ACCENT'UATED, pp. Marked, or pronounced with an accent.

ACCENT'UATING, ppr. Marking, or pronouncing with an accent.

ACCENTUA'TION, n. The act of placing accents in writing, or of pronouncing them in speaking.

ACCEPT', v. t. [L. accepto, from accipio, ad and capio to take; Fr. accepter. [See Lat. capio.] 1. To take or receive what is offered, with a consenting mind; to receive with approbation or favour; as, he made an offer which was accepted.

Bless, Lord, his substance, and accept the work of his hands. Deut. xxxiii.

Observe the difference between receive and accept.

He received an appointment, or the offer of a commission, but he did not accept it.

2. To regard with partiality; to value or esteem.

It is not good to accept the person of the wicked; Prov. xviii.; 2 Cor. viii.

In theol., acceptance with God implies forgiveness of sins and reception into his favour.—3. To consent or agree to; to receive as terms of a contract; as, to accept a treaty; often followed by of; as, accept of the terms.—4. To understand; to have a particular idea of; to receive in a particular sense; as, how is this phrase to be accepted? —5. In com., to agree or promise to pay; as, a bill of exchange. [See ACCEPTANCE.]

ACCEPT'ABLE, a. That may be received with pleasure; hence, pleasing to a receiver; gratifying; as, an acceptable present.—2. Agreeable or pleasing in person; as, a man makes himself acceptable by his services or civilities.

ACCEPT'ABLENESS, } n. The qual-
ACCEPTABIL'ITY, } ity of being agreeable to a receiver, or to a person with whom one has intercourse. [The latter word is little used, or not at all.]

ACCEPT'ABLY, adv. In a manner to please, or give satisfaction.

Let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably; Heb. xii.

ACCEPT'ANCE, n. A receiving with approbation or satisfaction; favourable reception; as, work done to acceptance.

They shall come up with acceptance on my altar; Isa. lx.

2. The receiving of a bill of exchange or order, in such a manner, as to bind the acceptor to make payment. This must be by express words; and to charge the drawer with costs, in case of non-payment, the acceptance must be in writing, under, across, or on the back of the bill.—3. An agreeing to terms or proposals in commerce, by which a bargain is concluded and the parties bound.—4. An agreeing to the act or contract of another, by some act which binds the person in law; as, a bishop's taking rent reserved on a lease made by his predecessor, is an acceptance of the terms of the lease, and binds the party; also in common law, the accepting or taking of one thing as a compensation for the payment or performance of another.—5. In mercantile language, a bill of exchange accepted; as, a merchant receives another's acceptance in payment.—6.†Formerly, the sense in which a word is understood. [See ACCEPTATION.]

ACCEPTA'TION, n. Kind reception; a receiving with favour or approbation.

This is a saying worthy of all acceptation; 1 Tim. i.

2. A state of being acceptable; favourable regard.

Some things are of great dignity and acceptation with God. Hooker.

But in this sense acceptableness is more generally used.—3. The meaning or sense in which a word or expression is understood, or generally received; as, a term is to be used according to its usual acceptation.—4. Reception in general.†

ACCEPT'ED, pp. Kindly received; regarded; agreed to; understood; received as a bill of exchange.

ACCEPT'ER, } n. A person who ac-
ACCEPT'OR, } cepts. Acceptor in com., is the person who accepts a bill of exchange by signing it, and obliging himself to pay the contents.

ACCEPTILA'TION,† n. [from L.] The remission of a debt by an acquittance from the creditor, without receiving the money.

ACCEPT'ING, ppr. Receiving favourably; agreeing to; understanding.

ACCEP'TION,† n. The received sense of a word.

ACCEPT'IVE,† a. Ready to accept.

ACCESS', n. [L. accessus, from accedo. See ACCEDE. Fr. accès.] 1. A coming to; near approach; admittance; admission; as, to gain access to a prince.—2. Approach, or the way by which a thing may be approached; as, the access is by a neck of land. 3. Means of approach; liberty to approach; implying previous obstacles.

By whom also we have access by faith; Rom. v.

4. Admission to sexual intercourse.

During coverture, access of the husband shall be presumed, unless the contrary be shown. Blackstone.

5. Addition; increase by something added; as, an access of territory; but in this sense accession is more generally used.—6. The return of a fit or paroxysm of disease, or fever. In this sense accession is generally used.

AC'CESSARILY. [See ACCESSORILY.]

AC'CESSARINESS. [See ACCESSORINESS.]

AC'CESSARY. [See ACCESSORY.]

ACCESSIBIL'ITY, n. The quality of being approachable, or of admitting access.

ACCESS'IBLE, a. That may be approached or reached; approachable; applied to things; as, an accessible town or mountain.—2. Easy of approach; affable; used of persons.

ACCESS'IBLY, adv. So as to be accessible.

ACCESS'ION, n. [L. accessio.] A coming to; an acceding to and joining; as, a king's accession to a confederacy.—2. Increase by something added; that which is added; augmentation; as, an accession of wealth or territory.—3. In law, a mode of acquiring property, by which the owner of a corporeal substance, which receives an addition by growth, or by labour, has a right to the thing added or the improvement; provided the thing is not changed into a different species. Thus the owner of a cow becomes the owner of her calf. Deed of accession in Scotch law, is a deed executed by the creditors of a bankrupt, by which they approve of a trust given by their debtor for the general behoof, and bind themselves to concur in the plans proposed for extricating his affairs.—4. The act of arriving at a throne, an office, or dignity.—5. That which is added.

The only accession which the Roman empire received, was the province of Britain. Gibbon.

6. The invasion of a fit of a periodical disease, or fever. It differs from exacerbation. Accession implies a total previous intermission, as of a fever; exacerbation implies only a previous remission or abatement of violence.

ACCESS'IONAL, a. Additional.

ACCESSO'RIAL, a. Pertaining to an accessory; as, accessorial agency, accessorial guilt.

AC'CESSORILY, adv. [See ACCESSORY.] In the manner of an accessory; by subordinate means, or in a secondary character; not as principal but as a subordinate agent.

AC'CESSORINESS, n. The state of being accessory, or of being or acting in a secondary character.

AC'CESSORY, a. [L. accessorius, from accessus, accedo. See ACCEDE. This word is accented on the first syllable on account of the derivatives, which require a secondary accent on the third; but the natural accent of accessory is on the second syllable, and thus it is often pronounced by good speakers.] 1. Acceding; contributing; aiding in producing some effect, or acting in subordination to the principal agent. Usually, in a bad sense; as, John was accessory to the felony.—2. Aiding in certain acts or effects in a secondary manner; as, accessory sounds in music.

AC'CESSORY, n. In law, one who is guilty of a felony, not by committing the offence in person or as principal, but by advising or commanding another to commit the crime, or by concealing the offender. There may be accessories in all felonies, but not in treason. An accessory before the fact, is one who counsels or commands another to commit a felony, and is not present when the act is executed; after the fact, when one receives and conceals the offender.—2. That which accedes or belongs to something else, as its principal. Accessory nerves, in anatomy, a pair of nerves, which, arising from the medulla in the vertebers of the neck, ascend and enter the skull; then, passing out with the par vagum, are distributed into the muscles of the neck and shoulders. Accessory, among painters, an epithet given to parts of a history-piece which are merely ornamental, as vases, armour, &c. In the fine arts, in general the term extends to everything introduced into a work that is not absolutely necessary.

ACCIACCATU'RA, n. (Ital.) In mus., denotes the putting down, along with any interval, the half note below it, and instantly taking off the finger which has struck the lowest of the two notes, continuing the sound of the other note till the harmony is changed.

AC'CIDENCE, n. [See ACCIDENT.] A small book containing the rudiments of grammar.

AC'CIDENT, n. [L. accidens, falling from ad and cado, to fall; W. codum, a fall, cwyzaw, to fall. See CASE and CADENCE.] 1. A coming or falling; an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause, or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore not expected; chance; casualty; contingency.—2. That which takes place or begins to exist without an efficient intelligent cause and without design.

All of them, in his opinion, owe their being to fate, accident, or the blind action of stupid matter. Dwight.

3. In logic, a property, or quality of a being which is not essential to it, as whiteness in paper. Also all qualities are called accidents, in opposition to substance, as sweetness, softness, and things not essential to a body, as clothes. —4. In gram., something belonging to a word, but not essential to it, as gender, number, inflection.—5. In her., a point or mark, not essential to a coat of arms.

AC̄CIDENT'AL, a. Happening by chance, or rather unexpectedly; casual; fortuitous; taking place not according to the usual course of things; opposed to that which is constant, regular, or intended; as, an accidental visit. —2. Non-essential; not necessarily belonging to; as songs are accidental to a play. Accidental colours, are those which depend upon the affections of the eye, in distinction from those which belong to the light itself.

Accidental point, (perspect.) that point in which a right line drawn from the eye, parallel to another given right line, cuts the picture or plane. Thus, suppose AB to be the line given in perspective, C F E the perspective plane, D the eye, C D the line parallel to AB; then is C the accidental point.

Accidental in music is an epithet given to such sharps, flats, and naturals as do not occur in the clef, and which imply some change of key or modulation different from that in which the piece began.

AC̄CIDENT'ALLY, adv. By chance; casually; fortuitously; not essentially.

AC̄CIDENT'ALNESS, n. The quality of being casual. [Lit. us.]

AC̄CIDEN'TALS, n. In painting, those fortuitous, or chance effects, occurring from luminous rays falling on certain objects, by which they are brought into stronger light than they otherwise would be, and their shadows are consequently of greater intensity.

AC̄CIDEN'TIARY,† a. Pertaining to the accidence.

AC̄CIPEN'SER, or AC̄IPEN'SER, n. In ichth., a genus of fishes. [See STURGEON.]

AC̄CIP'ITER, n. [L. ad and capio, to seize.] 1. A name given to a fish, the Milvus or Lucerna, a species of Trigla. —2. In ornith., the name of the order of rapacious fowls. The Accipiters have a hooked bill, the superior mandible, near the base, being extended on each side beyond the inferior. The Accipiters.

a Head and Foot of Gerfalcon.
b Head and Foot of Orange Legged Falcon.

genera are the Vulture, the Falco or hawk, and the Strix or owl.

AC̄CIP'ITRINE, a. [Supra] Seizing; rapacious; as, the accipitrine order of fowls.

AC̄CITE,† v. t. [L. ad and cito, to cite.] To call; to cite; to summon.

AC̄CLAIM, v. t. [L. acclamo, ad and clamo, to cry out; W. llevain; Ir. liumham. See CLAIM, CLAMOUR.] To applaud. [Lit. us.]

AC̄CLAIM, n. A shout of joy; acclamation.

AC̄CLAMA'TION, n. [L. acclamatio. See ACCLAIM.] 1. A shout of applause uttered by a multitude. Anciently, acclamation was a form of words, uttered with vehemence. Acclamations were ecclesiastical, military, nuptial, senatorial, synodical, theatrical, &c.; they were musical, and rhythmical; and bestowed for joy, respect, and even reproach, and often accompanied with words, repeated, five, twenty, and even sixty and eighty times. In the later ages of Rome, acclamations were performed by a chorus of music instructed for the purpose. In modern times, acclamations are expressed by hurrahs; by clapping of hands; and often by repeating vivat rex, vivat respublica, long live the king or republic. —2. In archæology, a representation in sculpture or on medals of people expressing joy.

AC̄CLAM'ATORY, a. Expressing joy or applause by shouts, or clapping of hands.

AC̄CLI'MATE, v. t. [ac for ad, and climate.] To habituate the body to a climate not native, so as not to be peculiarly exposed to its endemic diseases.

AC̄CLI'MATED, a. Habituated to a foreign climate, or a climate not native; so far accustomed to a foreign climate as not to be peculiarly liable to its endemic diseases.

Our zeal should be according to knowledge. Sprat.

Here the whole preceding parts of the sentence are to accord, i. e. agree with, correspond with, or be suitable to, what follows. According, here, has its true participial sense, agreeing, and is always followed by to. It is never a preposition.

AC̄C̄ORD'INGLY, adv. Agreeably; suitably; in a manner conformable to. Those who live in faith and good works will be rewarded accordingly.

AC̄C̄ORD'ION, n. [from accord.] A small keyed wind instrument, whose tones are generated by the play of wind upon metallic reeds. It is a small wind-chest, the sides of which are made to fold and expand like a bellows. On the top are apertures in which the reeds are inserted, and upon which the reeds play. Each key playing on two apertures, the reeds of which are furnished with reversed valves, is made to command two successive notes in the scale, according as the wind is drawn in by expanding the chest, or forced out by closing it. In addition to the keys there is a slide which opens upon reeds attuned to the harmonics of the tonic and dominant, by opening which, the air has an harmonic accompaniment. The bottom of the chest is furnished with a large key, by which the chest may be opened, and suddenly exhausted or filled, as need requires. This is a melodious portable instrument, commanding two or three octaves in the diatonic scale.

ACCUS'TOMARY, a. Usual; customary. [See CUSTOMARY.] [Lit. us.]

ACCUS'TOMED, pp. Being familiar by use; habituated; inured.—2. a. Usual; often practised; as, in their accustomed manner.

ACCUS'TOMING, ppr. Making familiar by practice; inuring.

ACE, n. [L. as, a unit or pound; Fr. as.] 1. A unit; a single point on a card or die; or the card or die so marked.—2. A very small quantity; a particle; an atom; a trifle; as, a creditor will not abate an ace of his demand.

ACEL'DAMA, n. [Ch. חקל, akel, a field, and דמא, dama, Ch. Syr. and Sam., blood.] A field said to have lain south of Jerusalem, the same as the potter's field, purchased with the bribe which Judas took for betraying his master, and therefore called the field of blood. It was appropriated to the interment of strangers.

ACEPH'ALA, n. plur. [ακεφαλοι, headless.] In nat. hist., a division of molluscous animals, like the oyster and scallop, without heads. The acephala of Cuvier comprehend many genera of animals with bivalve shells, and a few which are devoid of shells.

ACEPH'ALI, n. [Gr. α and κεφαλη.] A sect of levellers who acknowledged no chief or head.

ACEPH'ALOUS, a. [Gr. α priv. and κεφαλη, a head.] Without a head, headless. In hist., the term Acephali, or Acephalites, was given to several sects who refused to follow some noted leader, and to such bishops as were exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch. It was also given to certain levellers who acknowledged no head in the reign of Henry I. It was also applied to the Blemmyes, a pretended nation of Africa, and to other tribes in the East, whom ancient naturalists represented as having no head; their eyes and mouth being placed in other parts. Modern discoveries have dissipated these fictions. In English laws, men who held lands of no particular lord, and clergymen who were under no bishop.—2. In nat. hist., headless; a term applied by Cuvier to animals not having any head. [See ACEPHALA.] In bot., ovaries, the style of which springs from their base instead of their apex, are sometimes termed acephalous.

ACEPH'ALUS, n. An obsolete name of the tænia or tape-worm, which was formerly supposed to have no head; an error now exploded. The term is also used to express a verse defective in the beginning. Among medical men, it is applied to a lusus naturæ, or monster born without a head.

ACEPOINT, n. The side of a die that has but one spot.

ACERB', a. [L. acerbus; G. herbe, harsh, sour, tart, bitter, rough, whence herbst, autumn, herbstzeit, harvest time; D. herfst, harvest. See HARVEST.] Sour, bitter, and harsh to the taste; sour, with astringency or roughness; a quality of unripe fruits.

ACERB'ATE, v. t. To make sour, bitter, or harsh to the taste.

ACERB'ATING, ppr. Making sour.

ACERB'ITY, n. A sourness, with roughness, or astringency.—2. Figuratively, harshness, or severity of temper in man.

ACER'IC, a. [L. acer, a maple-tree.] Pertaining to the maple; obtained from the maple.

Aceric acid, an acid found in the juice of the acer campestre, or common maple.

AC'EROUS, AC'EROSE, a. [L. acerosus, chaffy, from acus, chaff or a point.] In bot., chaffy; resembling chaff.—2. An acerous or acerose leaf is one which is linear and permanent, in form of a needle, as in pine, or common juniper.

Acerous Leaves (Yew).

ACERV'AL, a. Pertaining to a heap.

ACERV'ATE, v. t. To heap up.

ACES'CENCY, n. [L. acescens, turning sour, from acesco. See ACID.] A turning sour by spontaneous decomposition; a state of becoming sour, tart, or acid; and hence a being moderately sour.

ACES'CENT, a. Turning sour; becoming tart or acid by spontaneous decomposition; as vegetable or animal juices, or infusions. Hence, slightly sour; but the latter sense is usually expressed by acidulous or sub-acid.

ACES'TE, n. In entom., a species of papilio or butterfly, with subdentated wings, found in India.

ACES'TIS, n. [Gr.] A factitious sort of chrysocolla, made of Cyprian verdigris, urine, and nitre.

ACETAB'ULUM, n. [L. from acetum, vinegar. See ACID.] 1. Among the Romans, a vessel in which sauce was served to table, and not unlike our vinegar cruets; also, a measure about one-eighth of a pint.—2. In anat., the cavity of a bone for receiving the protuberant end of another bone, and therefore forming the articulation called enarthrosis. It is used especially for the cavity of the os innominatum, which receives the head of the thigh bone.—3. In bot., the trivial name of a species of Peziza, the cup peziza; so called from its resemblance to a cup.—4. A glandular substance found in the placenta of some animals.—5. It is sometimes used in the sense of cotyledon.

ACETA'RIOUS PLANTS. Plants used in salading; such as lettuce, mustard and cress, endive, &c.

AC'ETARY, n. [See ACID.] An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear, inclosed in a congeries of small calculous bodies, towards the base of the fruit.

AC'ETATE, n. A salt formed by the union of acetic acid with any salifiable base; as, with an alkali, an earth, or a metallic oxide.

AC'ETATED, a. Combined with acetic acid.

ACE'TIC AC'ID, n. An acid composed of carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen, always in the same uniform and definite proportions. It exists in vinegar in a dilute and impure state.

ACETIFICA'TION, n. The act of making acetous or sour; or the operation of making vinegar.

ACETIFY, v. t. To convert into acid or vinegar.

AC'ETITE, n A salt, supposed to be formed with an acid containing the same proportions of carbon and hydrogen as the acetic acid, but with less oxygen, and denominated acetous acid. As, however, no such acid exists, the term acetite is not now used.

AC'ETOM'ETER, n. [L. acetum, vinegar, and μετρον, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength of vinegar.

ACE'TOUS AC'ID, n. A term formerly applied to impure and dilute acetic acid, under the notion that it was composed of carbon and hydrogen in the same proportions as in acetic acid, but with less oxygen. It is now known that no such acid exists, so that this term is not now in use.

ACE'TUM, n. [L. See ACID.] Vinegar; a sour liquor, obtained from vegetables dissolved in boiling water, and from fermented and spirituous liquors, by exposing them to heat and air. This is called the acid or acetous fermentation.

ACHE, v. i. (ake). [Sax. ace, ece; Gr. αχεω, to ache or be in pain; αχος, pain. The primary sense is, to be pressed. Perhaps the Oriental עָקָה, ozek, to press.]—1. To suffer pain; to have or be in pain, or in continued pain; as, the head aches.—2. To suffer grief, or extreme grief; to be distressed; as, the heart aches.

ACHE, n. (ake). Pain, or continued pain, in opposition to sudden twinges, or spasmodic pain. It denotes a more moderate degree of pain than pang, anguish, and torture.

ACHE'AN, a. Pertaining to Achaia in Greece, and a celebrated league or confederacy established there. This state lay on the Gulf of Corinth, within Peloponnesus.

ACHE'NIUM, or ACHÆNIUM, n. [α without and χαινω, I gape.] In bot., a small bony fruit, containing a single seed, which does not adhere to the shell or pericarp, and which does not open or dehisce when ripe. It is seen in the case of the boraginaceæ, or borage tribe, and the compositæ.

ACHERN'ER, n. A star of the first magnitude in the southern extremity of the constellation Eridanus.

ACH'ERON, n. [Gr. αχος, pain, and ῥοος, a river or stream.] A fabled river of hell or the lower region.

ACH'ERSET, n. An ancient measure of corn, supposed to be about eight bushels.

ACHERU'SIAN, a. Pertaining to Acherusia, a lake in Campania in Italy.

ACHIEVABLE, a. [See ACHIEVE.] That may be performed.

ACHIEVANCE, n. Performance.

ACHIEVE, v. t. [Fr. achever, to finish; old Fr. chever, to come to the end, from Fr. chef, the head or end; old Eng. cheve. See CHIEF.] 1. To perform or execute; to accomplish; to finish, or carry on to a final close. It is appropriately used for the effect of efforts made by the hand or bodily exertion; as, deeds achieved by valour.—2. To gain or obtain, as the result of exertion.

> Show all the spoils by valiant kings achieved. Prior.

ACHIEVED, pp. Performed; obtained; accomplished.

ACHIEVEMENT, n. The performance of an action.—2. A great or heroic deed; something accomplished by valour or boldness.—3. An obtaining by exertion.—4. An escutcheon or ensigns armorial, granted originally for the performance of a great or honourable action. The term is now generally applied to the funeral achievements of deceased persons.

Funeral Achievement.

ACHIEVER, n. One who accomplishes a purpose, or obtains an object by his exertions.

ACHIEVING, ppr. Performing; executing; gaining.

ACHING, ppr. [See ACHE.] Being in pain; suffering distress.

A'CHING, n. Pain; continued pain or distress.

A'CHIOTE, n. The anotta, a tree, and a drug used for dyeing red. The bark of the tree makes good cordage, and the wood is used to excite fire by friction. [See ANOTTA.]

ACH'IRITE, n. Emerald malachite.

ACHLAMYD'EOUS, a. [α neg. and Gr. χλαμυς, a garment.] A term applied to plants which have neither calyx nor corolla, and whose flowers are consequently destitute of a covering, or naked.

ACH'MITE, n. A mineral of a brownish black, or reddish brown colour, supposed to be a bisilicate of soda, combined with a bisilicate of iron.

A'CHOR, n. [Gr. αχωρ, sordes capitis.] 1. The scald head a disease forming scaly eruptions, supposed to be a critical evacuation of acrimonious humours; a species of herpes.—2. In myth., the god of flies, said to have been worshipped by the Cyreneans, to avoid being vexed by those insects.

ACHROMAT'IC, a. [α Gr. priv. and χρωμα, colour.] Destitute of colour. The rays of light suffer unequal refrangibility in their passage through a lens of uniform medium, and hence the outlines of objects are fringed with prismatic hues, and thereby rendered confused and indistinct. Achromatic telescopes are those in which the object glass is formed of a combination of lenses, so contrived that the light, which is broken into various rays of different colours by one lens, is re-collected, or nearly so, by another, so that the image does not present those coloured rings round its edge, which are always observable in bad telescopes.

ACHROMATIC'ITY, n. State of being achromatic.

ACH'ROMATISM, n. The state of being achromatic.

ACIC'ULAR, a. [L. acicula, Priscian, a needle, from Gr. ακη, L. acies, a point. See ACID.] In the shape of a needle; having sharp points like needles; rocks of granite having sharp needle-like summits are thus named. An acicular prism is when the crystals are slender and straight.

ACIC'ULARLY, adv. In the manner of needles, or prickles.

AC'ID, a. [L. acidus; Sax. æced, vinegar; from the root of acies, edge; Gr. ακη; W. awc, an edge or point. See EDGE.] Sour, sharp, or biting to the taste, having the taste of vinegar, as acid fruits or liquors.

AC'ID, n. A compound capable of uniting with salifiable bases, and thereby forming salts. An acid may be composed either of a simple or compound acidifiable base united with one or more acidifying principles. The chief properties by which this numerous and important class of chemical bodies is distinguished, are these: 1. When taken into the mouth they occasion the taste of sourness; they are corrosive, unless diluted with water, and some of them are caustic.—2. They change certain vegetable blue colours to red, and restore blue colours which have been turned green, or red colours which have been turned blue by an alkali.—3. Most of them unite with water in all proportions, with a condensation of volume, and an evolution of heat; and many of them have so strong an attraction for water as not to appear in the solid state.—4. They have a stronger affinity for alkalies than these have for any other substance; and in combining with them, most of them produce effervescence.—5. They unite in definite proportions with earths, alkalies, and metallic oxides, forming interesting compounds, usually called salts.—6. With few exceptions they are volatilized or decomposed by a moderate heat. The old chemists divided acids into animal, vegetable, and mineral, a division now deemed inaccurate. They have also been arranged into those which have a single, and those which have a compound basis or radical. But the following arrangement is considered more specific. 1. Oxygen acids.—2. Hydrogen acids.—3. Acids destitute of both these supposed acidifiers.—4. Acids of organic origin.

ACIDIF'EROUS, a. [Acid and L. fero.] Containing acids, or an acid. Acidiferous minerals are such as consist of an earth combined with an acid; as carbonate of lime, aluminite, &c.

ACID'IFIABLE, a. [From ACIDIFY.] Capable of being converted into an acid, by union with an acidifying principle without decomposition.

ACIDIFICA'TION, n. The act or process of acidifying or changing into an acid.

ACID'IFIED, pp. Made acid; converted into an acid.

ACID'IFIER, n. A simple or compound principle, whose presence is necessary for acidity. The elementary acidifying principles are oxygen, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, sulphur, selenium and tellurium. Cyanogen may be named as an example of a compound acidifying principle, and probably there is one or two more. No acid is known which does not contain one of these substances.

ACID'IFY, v. t. [Acid and L. facio.] To make acid; but appropriately to convert into an acid, chemically so called, by combination with any substance.

ACID'IFYING, ppr. Making acid; converting into an acid; having power to change into an acid. Oxygen is called an acidifying principle or element.

ACIDIM'ETER, n. [Acid and Gr. μετρον, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength of acids.

ACIDIM'ETRY, n. The measurement of the strength of acids.

ACID'ITY, n. [Fr. acidité, from acid.] The quality of being sour; sourness; tartness; sharpness to the taste.

AC'IDNESS, n. The quality of being sour; acidity.

ACID'ULÆ, n. plur. Medicinal springs impregnated with sharp particles.

ACID'ULATE, v. t. [L. acidulus, slightly sour; Fr. aciduler, to make slightly sour. See ACID.] To tinge with an acid; to make acid in a moderate degree.

ACID'ULATED, pp. Tinged with an acid; made slightly sour.

ACID'ULATING, ppr. Tinging with an acid.

AC'IDULE, } n. In chem., a salt, in ACID'ULUM, } which the acid is in excess; as, tartaric acidulum, oxalic acidulum.

ACID'ULOUS, a. [L. acidulus. See ACID.] Slightly sour; sub-acid; as, acidulous sulphate.

ACINAC'IFORM, a. [L. acinaces, a scimeter, Gr ακινακης, and L. forma, form.] In bot., formed like, or resembling a scimeter; a leaf is called acinaciform when it has one edge convex and sharp, and the other straight and thick, as in the mesembryanthemum.

Acinacific m Leaf

ACIN'IFORM, a. [L. acinus, a grape stone, and forma, shape.] Having the form of grapes; being in clusters like grapes; also, a name anciently given to the uvea or posterior lamina of the iris, from its colour, and to the choroid coat, from its form. Anatomists apply the term to many glands of a similar formation.

AC'INOSE, } a. [From L. acinus. See
AC'INOUS, } ACINIFORM.] Consisting of minute granular concretions; used in mineralogy.

AC'INUS, n. [L.] In bot., one of the small grains which compose the fruit of the bramble and raspberry, &c.

AC'IPENSER, a. In ichth., a genus of fishes of the order of Chondropterygii, having an obtuse head; the mouth under the head, retractile, and without teeth. To this genus belong the sturgeon, sterlet, huso, &c.

Sterlet.

ACIT'LI, n. A name of the water hare, or great crested grebe or diver.

ACKNOWL'EDGE, v. t. (aknol'edge). [ad and knowledge. See KNOW.] 1. To own, avow, or admit to be true, by a declaration of assent; as, to acknowledge the being of a God.—2. To own or notice with particular regard.

In all thy ways acknowledge God; Prov. iii.; Isa. xxxiii.

3. To own or confess, as implying a consciousness of guilt.

I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me; Ps. li. and xxxii.

4. To own with assent, to admit or receive with approbation.

He that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also; 1 John ii.; 2 Tim. ii.

5. To own with gratitude; to own as a benefit; as, to acknowledge a favour, or the receipt of a gift.

They his gifts acknowledged not. Milton.

6. To own or admit to belong to; as, to acknowledge a son.—7. To receive with respect.

All that see them shall acknowledge that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed; Isa. vi.; 1 Cor. xvi.

8. To own, avow, or assent to an act in a legal form, to give it validity; as, to acknowledge a deed before competent authority.

ACKNOWL'EDGED, pp. Owned; confessed; noticed with regard or gratitude; received with approbation; owned before authority.

ACKNOWL'EDGING, ppr. Owning; confessing; approving; grateful; but the latter sense is a Gallicism.

ACKNOWL'EDGMENT, n. The act of owning; confession; as, the acknowledgment of a fault.—2. The owning, with approbation, or in the true character; as, the acknowledgment of a God, or of a public minister.—3. Concession; admission of the truth; as of a fact, position, or principle.—4. The owning of a benefit received, accompanied with gratitude; and hence it combines the idea of an expression of thanks. Hence, it is used also for something given or done in return for a favour.—5. A declaration or avowal of one's own act, to give it legal validity; as, the acknowledgment of a deed before a proper officer.

ACLIDE, n. [Lat.] A missive weapon used by the Roman soldiery; a sharp javelin, with a thong fixed to it, for drawing it back, when thrown.

AC'ME, n. (ac'my). [Gr. ακμη.] The top or highest point. It is used to denote the maturity or perfection of an animal. Among physicians, the crisis of a disease, or its utmost violence. Old medical writers divided the progress of a disease into four periods; the arche, or beginning; the anabasis, or increase; the acme, or utmost violence; and the paracme, or decline. In rhet., the extreme height or farthest point of pathos, or sentiment to which the mind is judiciously conducted by a series of impressions gradually rising in intensity. But acme can hardly be considered as a legitimate English word.

AC'NE, n. (ac'ny). [Gr.] A small hard pimple or tubercle on the face.

ACNES'TIS, n. [Gr. α priv. and κναω, to rub or gnaw.] That part of the spine in quadrupeds which extends from the metaphrenon, between the shoulder blades, to the loins; which the animal cannot reach to scratch.

AC'O, n. A Mediterranean fish, called also Sarachus.

AC'OLIN, n. A bird of the partridge kind in Cuba. Its breast and belly are white; its back and tail of a dusky yellow brown.

ACO'LOGY, or AKO'LOGY, n. [ακος a remedy, and λογος a discourse.] The doctrine of remedies or of the materia medica.

ACOL'OTHIST, } n. [Gr. ακολουθεω.]
AC'OLYTE, } In the ancient Church, one of the subordinate officers, who lighted the lamps, prepared the elements of the sacraments, attended the bishops, &c. An officer of the like character is still employed in the Romish Church.

AC'ONITE, n. [L. aconitum; Gr. ακονιτον.] The plant wolfsbane is the Aconitum Napellus of naturalists, a species belonging to a genus of poisonous plants called Aconitum.

ACON'TIAS, n. [Gr. ακοντιας: ακοντιον, a dart, from ακων.] 1. A species of serpent, called dart-snake, or jaculum, from its manner of darting on its prey. This serpent is about three feet in length; of a light gray colour, with black spots resembling eyes; the belly perfectly white. It is a native of Africa and the Mediterranean isles; is the swiftest of its kind, and coils itself up on a tree, from which it darts upon its prey.—2. A comet or meteor resembling the serpent.

ACOP,† adv. [a and cope.] At the top.

A'CORN, n. [Sax. æcern, from æc or ac, oak, and corn, a grain.] 1. The fruit of the oak; an oval nut which grows in a rough permanent cup. In bygone times, acorns were used as human food, and are still eaten in different parts of the continent in scarce years.

> The first settlers of Boston were reduced to the necessity of feeding on clams, muscles, ground nuts, and acorns. B. Trumbull.

2. In mar. lan., a small ornamental piece of wood, of a conical shape, fixed on the point of the spindle above the vane, on the mast head, to keep the vane from being blown off.—3. In nat. hist, the Lepas, a genus of shells of several species found on the British coast. The shell is multivalvular, unequal, and fixed by a stem; the valves are parallel and perpendicular, but they do not open, so that the animal performs its functions by an aperture on the top. These shells are always fixed to some solid body.

A'CORNED, a. Furnished or loaded with acorns. Acorned in her., signifies an oak tree with acorns upon it, represented on a coat of arms.

Acorned

AC'ORUS, n. [L. from Gr. ακορον.] 1. Sweet flag, or sweet rush. It belongs to the natural order Aroideæ, and is found in abundance in the fresh-water marshes of many parts of England.—2. In nat. hist, blue coral, which grows in the form of a tree on a rocky bottom, in some parts of the African seas. It is brought from the Camarones and Benin.—3. In med., this name is sometimes given to the great galangal.

ACOTYLE'DON, n. [Gr. α priv. and κοτυληδων, from κοτυλη, a hollow.] A plant without a cotyledon. In bot., applied to a plant whose seed is not furnished with cotyledons, or seed lobes. In the natural system of Jussieu, the acotyledons form a class which corresponds with the Cryptogamia of Linnæus. [See COTYLEDON.]

ACOTYLE'DONOUS, a. Having no seed lobes.

ACOUS'TIC, a. [Gr. ακουστικος from ακουω, to hear.] Pertaining to the ears, to the sense of hearing, or to the doctrine of sounds.

Acoustic duct in anat., the meatus auditorius, or external passage of the ear. Acoustic vessels, in ancient theatres, were brazen tubes or vessels, shaped like a bell, used to propel the voice of the actors, so as to render them audible to a great distance; in some theatres at the distance of 400 feet. Acoustic instrument, or auricular tube, called, in popular language, a speaking trumpet. Acoustics, or Acousmatics, was a name given to such of the disciples of Pythagoras as had not completed their five years probation.

ACOUS'TICS, n. The science of sounds, teaching their cause, nature, and phenomena. The manner in which sound is produced, its transmission through air and other media, sometimes called diacoustics; the doctrine of reflected sound, or echoes, sometimes called catacoustics; the properties and effects of different sounds, the organ of sound and the means of assisting it, are all treated of under Acoustics.—2. In med., this term is sometimes used for remedies for deafness, or imperfect hearing.

ACQUAINT, v. t. [Old Fr. accointer, to make known, whence accointance, acquaintance. Qu. Per. kunda, knowing, intelligent; Ger. kunde, knowledge; kund, known, public; D. kond or kunde, knowledge; Sw. kånd, known; Dan. kiender, to know, to be acquainted with. These words seem to have for their primitive root the Goth. and Sax. kunnan, to know, the root of cunning; Eng. can and ken; which see.] 1. To make known; to make fully or intimately known; to make familiar.

> A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; Isa. liii.

2. To inform; to communicate notice to; as, a friend in the country acquaints me with his success. Of before the object,—as, to acquaint a man of this design,—has been used, but is obsolete or improper.—3. To acquaint one's self, is to gain an intimate or particular knowledge of.

> Acquaint now thyself with him and be at peace; Job xxii.

ACQUAINTANCE, n. Familiar knowledge; a state of being acquainted, or of having intimate or more than slight or superficial knowledge; as, I know the man, but have no acquaintance with him. Sometimes it denotes a more slight knowledge.—2. A person or persons well known; usually persons we have been accustomed to see and converse with; sometimes, persons more slightly known.

> Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and my acquaintance into darkness; Ps. lxxxviii.

> My acquaintance are estranged from me; Job xix.

Acquaintances, in the plural, is used, as applied to individual persons known; but more generally acquaintance is used for one or more.

Acquaintant, in like sense is not used.

ACQUAINT'ANCESHIP, n. State of being acquainted.

ACQUAINTED, pp. Known; familiarly known; informed; having personal knowledge.

ACQUAINTING, ppr. Making known to; giving notice, or information to.

ACQUEST', n. [L. acquisitus, acquiro.] 1. Acquisition; the thing gained.—2. Conquest; a place acquired by force. —3. Acquest or Acquits, in law, denotes goods not descended by inheritance, but acquired by purchase or donation.

ACQUIESCE, v. i. (acquiess'.) [L. acquiesco, of ad and quiesco, to be quiet; quies, rest; Fr. acquiescer.] 1. To rest satisfied, or apparently satisfied, or to rest without opposition and discontent; usually implying previous opposition, uneasiness, or dislike, but ultimate compliance, or submission; as, to acquiesce in the dispensations of Providence.—2. To assent to, upon conviction; as, to acquiesce in an opinion; that is, to rest satisfied of its correctness, or propriety.

Acquiesced in, in a passive sense, complied with; submitted to, without opposition; as, a measure has been acquiesced in.

ACQUIES'CENCE, n. A quiet assent; a silent submission, or submission with apparent consent; distinguished from avowed consent on the one hand, and on the other from opposition or open discontent; as, an acquiescence in the decisions of a court, or in the allotments of Providence.

ACQUIES'CENT, a. Resting satisfied; easy; submitting; disposed to submit.

ACQUIES'CING, ppr. Quietly submitting; resting content.

ACQUIRABLE, a. That may be acquired.

ACQUIRABIL'ITY, n. State of being acquirable.

ACQUIRE, v. t. [L. acquiro, ad and quæro, to seek, that is, to follow, to press, to urge; acquiro signifies to pursue to the end or object; Fr. acquérir; Heb. חקר heker; to seek, to make toward, to follow. The L. quæsivi, unless contracted, is probably from a different root. To gain, by any means, something which is in a degree permanent, or which becomes vested or inherent in the possessor; as, to acquire a title, estate, learning, habits, skill, dominion, &c. Plants acquire a green colour from the solar rays. A mere temporary possession is not expressed by acquire, but by gain, obtain, procure; as, to obtain [not acquire] a book on loan.

> Descent is the title whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, acquires his estate by right of representation, as his heir at law. Blackstone.

ACQUIRED, pp. Gained, obtained, or received from art, labour, or other means, in distinction from those things which are bestowed by nature. Thus we say, abilites, natural and acquired. It implies title, or some permanence of possession.

AⱾQUIREMENT, n. The act of acquiring, or that which is acquired; attainment. It is used in opposition to natural gifts; as, eloquence, and skill in music and painting, are acquirements; genius, the gift of nature. It denotes especially personal attainments in opposition to material or external things gained, which are more usually called acquisitions; but this distinction is not always observed.

AⱾQUIRER, n. A person who acquires.

AⱾQUIRING, ppr. Gaining by labour or other means, something that has a degree of permanence in the possessor.

AⱾQUIR'ING, n. Acquirement.

AⱾQUI'RY,† n. Acquirement.

AⱾ'QUISITE,† a. (s as z.) Gained.

AⱾQUISI''TION, n. [L. acquisitio, from acquisitus, acquæsivi, which are given as the part. and pret. of acquiro; but quæsivi is probably from a different root; W. ceisiaw;] 1. The act of acquiring; as, a man takes pleasure in the acquisition of property, as well as in the possession.—2. The thing acquired, or gained; as, learning is an acquisition. It is used for intellectual attainments, as well as for external things, property or dominion; and, in a good sense, denoting something estimable.

AⱾQUIS'ITIVE, a. That is acquired; acquired; [but improper.]

ACQUIS'ITIVELY, adv. Noting acquirement, with to or for following.

AⱾQUIS'ITIVENESS, n. Among phrenologists, one of the propensities of the mind. Its organ is situated before secretiveness, and below ideality, at the inferior angle of the parietal bone. Its function is to produce the desire to acquire, and possess in general, and it takes its direction from the other faculties, which may lead it to desire the possession of pictures, antique coins, minerals, &c., as well as money. When the energy of this feeling is predominant, it leads to avarice, covetousness; —dishonesty and theft are its abuses.

ACQUIST',† n. See ACQUEST.

ACQUIT', v. t. [Fr. acquitter; W. gadu, gadaw; L. cedo.] To set free; to release or discharge from an obligation, accusation, guilt, censure, suspicion, or whatever lies upon a person as a charge or duty; as, the jury acquitted the prisoner; we acquit a man of evil intentions. It is followed by of before the object; to acquit from is obsolete. In a reciprocal sense, as, the soldier acquitted himself well in battle; the word has a like sense, implying the discharge of a duty or obligation. Hence its use in expressing excellence in performance; as, the orator acquitted himself well, that is, in a manner that his situation and public expectation demanded.

ACQUIT'MENT, n. The act of acquitting, or state of being acquitted. [This word is superseded by Acquittal.]

AⱾQUIT'TAL, n. A judicial setting free, or deliverance from the charge of an offence. It is used when a person is found not guilty, by a jury or verdict, of the offence wherewith he is charged.

AⱾQUIT'TANCE, n. A discharge or release from a debt.—2. The writing, which is evidence of a discharge; a receipt in full, which bars a further demand.

AⱾQUIT'TED, pp. Set free, or judicially discharged from an accusation; released from a debt, duty, obligation, charge, or suspicion of guilt.

AⱾQUIT'TING, ppr. Setting free from accusation; releasing from a charge, obligation, or suspicion of guilt.

AⱾRASE, AⱾRAZE, v. t. To make crazy; to infatuate. [See CRAZY.]—2.† To impair; to destroy.

AⱾ'RASY, n. [Gr. ακρασια from α priv. and κρασις, constitution or temperament.] In medical authors, an excess or predominancy of one quality above another, in mixture, or in the human constitution.

AⱾRE, n. (a'ker.) [Sax. acer, acera, or æcer; Ger. acker; W. eg; Ir. acra; Gr. αγρος; Lat. ager. In these languages, the word retains its primitive sense, an open, ploughed, or sowed field. In English it retained its original signification, that of any open field, until it was limited to a definite quantity by statutes 31 Ed. III.; 5 Ed. I.; 24 H. VIII.] 1. A quantity of land, containing 160 square rods or perches, or 4840 square yards. This is the English statute acre; but in different countries, and in different parts of the same country, the acre is of different value. The Scotch acre is larger than the English, as it contains 6150.40 square yards, 48 Scotch acres being equal to 61 English acres. The Irish acre is also larger than the English, inasmuch as 100 Irish acres are nearly equivalent to 162 English acres. The English statute acre is used in the United States of America. The Arpent or French acre is equal to one and a quarter of the English acre. That of Strasburg, is only about one half of the English acre.

Acre fight, a sort of duel in the open field, formerly fought by English and Scotch combatants on the frontiers of their kingdoms.

Acre-tax, a tax on land in England, at a certain sum for each acre, called also Acre-shot.

A'ⱾRED, a. Possessing acres or landed property.

AⱾ'RID, a. [Fr. acre; L. acer.] Sharp; pungent; bitter; sharp or biting to the taste; acrimonious; as acrid salts.

Acrid substances are those which excite in the organs of taste a sensation of pungency and heat, and, when applied to the skin, irritate and inflame it.

AⱾ'RIDNESS, n. A sharp, bitter, pungent quality.

AⱾRIFOL'IUM, n. [L. acer, and folium a leaf.] Any prickly-leaved plant.

AⱾRIMO'NIOUS, a. Sharp; bitter; corrosive; abounding with acrimony —2. Figuratively, severe; sarcastic; applied to language or temper.

AⱾRIMO'NIOUSLY, adv. With sharpness or bitterness.

ACRIMO'NIOUSNESS, n. The state or quality of being acrimonious.

AⱾ'RIMONY, n. [L. acrimonia, from acer, sharp. The latter part of the word seems to denote likeness, state, condition, like head, hood, in knighthood; in which case it may be from the same root as maneo, Gr. μενω.] 1. Sharpness; a quality of bodies, which corrodes, dissolves, or destroys others, as, the acrimony of the humours.—2. Figuratively, sharpness or severity of temper; bitterness of expression proceeding from anger, ill-nature, or petulance.

AⱾ'RISY, n. [Gr. α priv. and κρισις, judgment.] A state or condition of which no right judgment can be formed; that of which no choice is made; matter in dispute; injudiciousness. [Lit. us.]—2. Among physicians a state of disease in which no judgment can be formed; or one in which the prognosis is unfavourable.

AⱾRI'TA, n. plu. [Gr. ακριτος, indiscernible.] 1. A name given to certain species of animals, in which a nervous system has not been discovered.—2 In med., defect of crisis, or of a separation and expulsion of morbific matter in the human body.

AⱾ'RITUDE, n. [See ACRID.] An acrid quality; bitterness to the taste; biting heat.

AⱾROAMAT'IⱾ, a. [Gr. ακροαματικος, from ακροαομαι, to hear.] Abstruse; pertaining to deep learning; an epithet applied to the secret doctrines of Aristotle, which were also called esoterical.

AⱾROAMAT'IⱾS, n. Aristotle's lectures on the more subtle parts of philosophy, otherwise called esoterical, to which none but intimate disciples were admitted; in contradistinction to the exoteric parts of philosophy, or such as he taught openly.

AⱾROAT'IⱾ, a. [Gr. ακροατικος.] Abstruse; pertaining to deep learning, and opposed to exoteric. Aristotle's lectures were of two kinds, acroatic, acroamatic, or esoteric, which were delivered to a class of select disciples, who had been previously instructed in the elements of learning; and exoteric, which were delivered in public. The former respected being, God, and nature; the principal subjects of the latter were logic, rhetoric, and policy. The abstruse lectures were called acroatics.

ACROCERAU'NIAN, a. [Gr. ακρα, a summit, and κεραυνος, thunder.] An epithet applied to certain mountains, between Epirus and Illyricum, in the 41st degree of latitude. They project into the Adriatic, and are so termed from being often struck with lightning AⱾRODAⱾ'TYLUM, n. [ακρος, highest or extreme, and δακτυλος, a digit.] In Zool., the upper surface of each digit.

AⱾ'ROGENS, n. [ακρος and γινομαι] A term applied to the arborescent or tree ferns, which are very lofty, and grow at the top only, never augmenting in thickness, after they are once formed.

AⱾROLITH, n. [Gr. ακρος and λιθος.] In arch., and sculp., a statue, the extremities of which are stone.

ACRO'MION, n. [Gr. ακρος, highest, and ωμος, shoulder.] In anat., that part of the spine of the scapula which receives the extreme part of the clavicle.

AⱾRON'IⱾ, AⱾRON'ICAL, a. [Gr. ακρος, extreme, and νυξ, night.] In astr., a term applied to the rising of a star at sun-set, or its setting at sunrise. This rising or setting is called acronical. The word is opposed to cosmical.

AⱾRON'IⱾALLY, adv. In an acronical manner; at the rising or setting of the sun.

AⱾROPO'DIUM, n. [ακρος and πους foot.] In Zool., the upper surface of the whole foot.

AⱾROP'OLIS, n. [Gr. ακρος, and πολις.] The highest part or citadel of a city, particularly that of Athens, where the treasury and public records were kept.

AⱾ'ROSPIRE, n. [Gr. ακρος, highest, and σπειρα, a spire, or spiral line.] A shoot, or sprout of a seed. The plumula of barley developed by germination. The plumula is that part destined to become the stem, or from which the blade springs.

AC'ROSPIRED, a. Having a sprout, or having sprouted, at both ends. In malt making, a term used for such grains of barley as sprout at the blade end, as well as at the root end.

ACROSS', prep. (akraus'.) [a and cross. See CROSS.] 1. From side to side, opposed to along, which is in the direc-
7 tion of the length; athwart; quite over; as, a bridge is laid across a river.—2. Intersecting; passing over at any angle; as a line passing across another.

ACROS'TIC, n. [Gr. ακρα, extremity or beginning, and στιχος, order or verse.] A composition in verse, in which the first letters of the lines, taken in order, form the name of a person, kingdom, city, &c., which is the subject of the composition, or some title or motto.

ACROS'TIC, a. That relates to, or contains an acrostic.

ACROS'TICALLY, adv. In the manner of an acrostic.

ACROTAR'SIUM, n. [ακρος and ταρσος, tarsus.] In Zool., the upper surface of the tarsus.

ACROTELEU'TIC, n. [Gr. ακρος, extreme, and τελευτη, end.] Among ecclesiastical writers, an appellation given to any thing added to the end of a psalm, or hymn; as a doxology.

ACRO'TERAL. See ACROTERIUM.

ACRO'TER, ACROTE'RIUM, n. [Gr. Ακρωτηριον.] In arch., an ornament, the apex or angles of a pediment. The term is generally restricted to the small pedestal which is placed on the apex or angles of a pediment for the support of a statue or other ornament. It is also used to denote the pinnacles or other ornaments on the horizontal copings or parapets of buildings, and which are sometimes called Acroteral ornaments. Anciently the word signified the extremities of the body, as the head, hands, and feet.

ACROTHYM'ION, n. [Gr. ακρος, extreme, and θυμος, thyme.] Among physicians, a species of wart, with a narrow basis and broad top, having the colour of thyme. It is called Thymus.

ACT, v. i. [Gr. αγω, Lat. ago, to urge, drive, lead, bring, do, perform; or in general, to move; to exert force; W. egni; Ir. aige, to act or carry on; F. agir; It. agire, to do or act.] 1. To exert power; as, the stomach acts upon food; the will acts upon the body in producing motion.—2. To be in action or motion; to move.

> He hangs between in doubt to act or rest. Pope.

3. To behave, demean, or conduct, as in morals, private duties, or public offices; as, we know not why a minister has acted in this manner. But in this sense, it is most frequent in popular language; as, how the man acts or has acted.

To act up to, is to equal in action; to fulfil, or perform a correspondent action; as, he has acted up to his engagement or his advantages.

ACT, v. t. To perform; to represent a character on the stage.

> Act well your part, there all the honour lies. Pope.

2. To feign or counterfeit. [Obs. or improper.]

> With acted fear the villain thus pursued. Dryden.

3. To put in motion; to actuate; to regulate movements.

> Most people in the world are acted by levity. South. Locke.

[In this latter sense obsolete, and superseded by Actuate, which see.]

ACT, n. The exertion of power; the effect of which power exerted is the cause; as, the act of giving or receiving. In this sense, it denotes an operation of the mind. Thus, to discern is an act of the understanding; to judge is an act of the will.—2. That which is done; a deed, exploit, or achievement, whether good or ill.

> And his miracles and his acts which he did in the midst of Egypt; Deut. xi.

3. Action; performance; production of effects; as, an act of charity. But this sense is closely allied to the foregoing.—4. A state of reality or real existence, as opposed to a possibility.

> The seeds of plants are not at first in act, but in possibility, what they afterwards grow to be. Hooker.

5. In general, act denotes action completed; but preceded by in, it denotes incomplete action.

> She was taken in the very act; John viii.

In act is used also to signify incipient action, or a state of preparation to exert power; as, "In act to strike," a poetical use.—6. A part or division of a play to be performed without interruption; after which the action is suspended to give respite to the performers. Acts are divided into smaller portions, called scenes.—7. The result of public deliberation, or the decision of a prince, legislative body, council, court of justice, or magistrate; a decree, edict, law, judgment, resolve, award, determination; as, an act of parliament, or of congress. The term is also transferred to the book, record, or writing, containing the laws and determinations.

Act among lawyers is an instrument or deed in writing, serving to prove the truth of some bargain or transaction.

Act and commission. In Scottish law, the form in the judicial proceedings of the Court of Session, by which a commission is given by the court to a person for taking proof in a depending action.

In the sense of agency, or power to produce effects, as in the passage cited by Johnson from Shakspeare, the use is improper:

> To try the vigour of them, and apply
> Allayments to their act.

Act, in English universities, is a thesis maintained in public, by a candidate for a degree, or to show the proficiency of a student. At Oxford, the time when masters and doctors complete their degrees is also called the act, which is held with great solemnity. At Cambridge, as in the United States, it is called commencement.

Act of faith, auto da fé, in Catholic countries, is a solemn day held by the Inquisition, for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of accused persons found innocent; or it is the sentence of the Inquisition.

Acts of the Apostles, the title of a book in the New Testament, containing a history of the transactions of the Apostles.

Acta Diurna, among the Romans, a sort of Gazette, containing an authorized account of transactions in Rome, nearly similar to our newspapers.

Acta Populi, or Acta Publica, the Roman registers of assemblies, trials, executions, buildings, births, marriages, and deaths of illustrious persons, &c.

Acta Senatûs, minutes of what passed in the Roman senate, called also Commentarii, commentaries.

ACT'ED, pp. Done; performed; represented on the stage.

AC'TIAN, a. Relating to Actium, a town and promontory of Epirus, as, Actian games, which were instituted by Augustus, to celebrate his naval victory over Anthony, near that town, Sept. 2, B. C. 31. They were celebrated every five years. Hence, Actian years, reckoned from that era.

ACT'ING, ppr. Doing; performing; behaving; representing the character of another.

ACT'ING, n. Action; act of performing a part of a play.

ACTIN'EA, n. An order of polypes.

ACTIN'OLITE, n. [Gr. ακτιν, a ray, and λιθος, a stone.] A mineral called by Werner, strahlstein, ray-stone, nearly allied to hornblend. It occurs in prismatic crystals, which are long and incomplete, and sometimes extremely minute and even fibrous. Its prevailing colour is green of different shades, or shaded with yellow or brown. There are several varieties, as the common, the massive, the acicular, the glassy, and the fibrous.

Actinolite-schist, a metamorphic rock, consisting principally of actinolite, with an admixture of mica, quartz, or feldspar; its texture is slaty and foliated.

ACTINOLIT'IC, a. Like or pertaining to actinolite.

ACTINO'METER, n. [ακτιν, a ray, and μετρον, measure.] An instrument invented by Sir John Herschel, for measuring the intensity of the sun's rays. [See PHOTOMETER.]

AC'TION, n. [L. actio. See ACT.] 1. Literally, a driving; hence, the state of acting or moving; exertion of power or force, as when one body acts on another: or action is the effect of power exerted on one body by another; motion produced. Hence, action is opposed to rest. Action, when produced by one body on another, is mechanical; when produced by the will of a living being, spontaneous or voluntary. [See Def. 3.]—2. An act or thing done; a deed.

> The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him are actions weighed; 1 Sam. ii.

3. In mech., agency; operation; driving impulse; effort of one body upon another; as, the action of wind upon a ship's sails; also the effect of such action. Action and reaction. Mechanical action is exerted either by percussion or pressure, and in either case, the force exerted by the acting body is repelled or resisted in an equal degree by the body on which it acts. This repulsion or resistance is termed reaction; and that "action and reaction are always equal and contrary," is not only laid down as an axiom in mechanics, but is understood to be a general law of nature, obtaining indeed throughout the whole solar system with the utmost precision.—4. In eth., the external signs or expression of the sentiments of a moral agent; conduct; behaviour; demeanour; that is, motion or movement, with respect to a rule or propriety.—5. In poet., a series of events, called also the subject or fable: this is of two kinds; the principal action, which is more strictly the fable, and the incidental action or episode.—6. In orat., gesture or gesticulation; the external deportment of the speaker, or the accommodation of his attitude, voice, gestures, and countenance to the subject, or to the thoughts and feelings of the mind.—7. In physio., the motions or functions of the body, vital, animal, and natural; vital and involuntary, as the action of the heart and lungs; animal, as muscular, and all voluntary motions; natural, as manducation, deglutition, and digestion.—8. In law, literally, an urging for right; a suit or process, by which a demand is made of a right; a claim made before a tribunal. Actions are real, personal, or mixed; real, or feudal, when the demandant claims a title to real estate; personal, when a man demands a debt, personal duty, or damages in lieu of it, or satisfaction for an injury to person or property; and mixed, when real estate is demanded, with damages for a wrong sustained. Actions are also civil or penal; civil, when instituted solely in behalf of private persons, to recover debts or damages; penal, when instituted to recover a penalty, imposed by way of punishment. The word is also used for a right of action; as, the law gives an action for every claim.

A chose in action, is a right to a thing, in opposition to the possession. A bond or note is a chose in action, [Fr. chose, a thing,] and gives the owner a right to prosecute his claim to the money, as he has an absolute property in a right, as well as in a thing, in possession.

9. In some countries of Europe, action is a share in the capital stock of a company, or in the public funds, equivalent to our term share; and consequently, in a more general sense, to stocks. The word is also used for movable effects.—10. In paint., and sculpt., the attitude or position of the several parts of the body, by which they seem to be actuated by passions; as, the arm extended, to represent the act of giving or receiving.—11. Battle; fight; engagement between troops in war, whether on land or water, or by a greater or smaller number of combatants. This and the 8th definition exhibit the literal meaning of action—a driving or urging.

Quantity of action, in physics, the product of the mass of a body by the space it runs through and its velocity.

In many cases action and act are synonymous; but some distinction between them is observable. Action seems to have more relation to the power that acts, and its operation and process of acting; and act, more relation to the effect or operation complete. Action is also more generally used for ordinary transactions; and act, for such as are remarkable or dignified; as, all our actions should be regulated by prudence; a prince is distinguished by acts of heroism or humanity.

Action taking, in Shakspeare, is used for litigious.

A€'TIONABLE, a. That will bear a suit, or for which an action at law may be sustained; as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

A€'TIONABLY, adv. In a manner that subjects to legal process.

A€'TIONARY or A€'TIONIST, n. In Europe, a proprietor of stock in a trading company; one who owns actions or shares of stock.

A€'TIVATE, v. t. To make active.

A€T'IVE, a. [L. activus; Fr. actif.] That has the power or quality of acting; that contains the principle of action, independent of any visible external force; as, attraction is an active power; or it may be defined, that communicates action or motion, opposed to passive, that receives action; as, the active powers of the mind.—2. Having the power of quick motion, or disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile; as, an active animal. Hence,—3. Busy; constantly engaged in action; pursuing business with vigour and assiduity; opposed to dull, slow, or indolent; as, an active officer. It is also opposed to sedentary; as, an active life.—4. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects; opposed to speculative; as, the active duties of life.—5. In gram., active verbs are those which not only signify action, but have a noun or name following them, denoting the object of the action or impression; called also transitive, as they imply the passing of the action expressed by the verb to the object; as, a professor instructs his pupils.—6. Active capital, or wealth, is money, or property that may readily be converted into money, and used in commerce or other employment for profit.—7. Active commerce, the commerce in which a nation carries its own productions and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens; as contradistinguished from passive commerce, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another country. The commerce of Great Britain and of the United States is active; that of China is passive.

Active molecules in plants are extremely minute, apparently spherical moving particles, found in all vegetable matter, when rubbed in pieces and examined under very powerful microscopes.

A€T'IVELY, adv. In an active manner; by action; nimbly; briskly; also in an active signification; as, a word is used actively.

A€T'IVENESS, n. The quality of being active; the faculty of acting; nimbleness; quickness of motion. Less used than Activity.

A€TIV'ITY, n. The quality of being active; the active faculty; nimbleness; agility; also the habit of diligent and vigorous pursuit of business; as, a man of activity. It is applied to persons or things.

Sphere of activity, is the whole space in which the virtue, power, or influence of any object is exerted.

To put in activity, a French phrase, for putting in action or employment.

A€T'RESS, n. A female who acts or performs, and especially, on the stage, or in a play.

A€T'UAL, a. [Fr. actuel. See Act.] 1. Real or effectual, or that exists truly and absolutely; as, actual heat, opposed to that which is virtual or potential; actual cautery, or the burning by a red-hot iron, opposed to a cautery or caustic application, that may produce the same effect upon the body by a different process.—2. Existing in act; real; in opposition to speculative, or existing in theory only; as an actual crime.—3. In theol., actual sin is that which is committed by a person himself, opposed to original sin, or the corruption of nature supposed to be communicated from Adam.—4. That includes action.

Besides her walking and other actual performances. [Hardly legitimate.] Shak.

A€TUAL'ITY, n. Reality.

A€T'UALIZE, v. t. To make actual.

A€T'UALIZING, ppr. Making actual.

A€T'UALLY, adv. In fact; really; in truth.

A€T'UALNESS, n. The quality of being actual.

A€T'UARY, n. [L. actuarius.] A registrar or clerk; a term of the civil law, and used originally in courts of civil law jurisdiction; but in Europe used for a clerk or registrar generally.

A€T'UATE, a. Put in action. [Lit. us.]

A€T'UATE, v. t. [From act.] To put into action; to move or incite to action; as, men are actuated by motives or passions. It seems to have been used formerly in the sense of invigorate, noting increase of action; but the use is not legitimate.

A€T'UATED, pp. Put in action; incited to action.

A€T'UATING, ppr. Putting in action; inciting to action.

A€TUA'TION, n. The state of being put in action; effectual operation.

ACUTIA'TOR, n. In the middle ages, a person whose office was to sharpen instruments. Before the invention of fire-arms, such officers attended armies to sharpen their instruments.

AD, a Latin preposition, signifying to. It is probably from Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. Eth. אתה, athe, Ar. to come near, to approach; from which root we may also deduce at. In composition, the last letter is usually changed into the first letter of the word to which it is prefixed. Thus for adclamo, the Romans wrote acclamo; for adgredior, aggredior; for adfirmo, affirmo; for adlego, allego; for adpono, appono; for adripio, arripio; for adscribo, ascribo; for adtineo, attineo. The reason of this change is found in the ease of pronunciation, and agreeableness of the sounds.

Ad hominem, to the man, in logic, an argument adapted to touch the prejudices of the person addressed.

Ad inquirendum, in law, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made.

Ad libitum, at pleasure.

Ad valorem, according to the valu in commerce and finance, terms used to denote duties or charges laid upon goods, at a certain rate per cent. upon their value, as stated in their invoices; in opposition to a specific sum upon a given quantity or number.

ADACT'ED, pp. Driven by force.

ADAC'TYLE, n. [α priv. and δακτυλος a digit.] In Zool. a locomotive extremity without digits.

AD'AGE, n. [L. adagium, axiom; It. adagio.] A proverb; an old saying, which has obtained credit by long use: a wise observation handed down from antiquity.

ADA'GIO, n. [It. adagio, a compound of ad and agio, leisure; L. otium; Eng. ease.] In mus., a slow movement. As an adverb, slowly, leisurely, and with grace. When repeated, adagio, adagio, it directs the movement to be very slow.

AD'AM, n. In Heb. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar., Man; primarily, the name of the human species, mankind; appropriately, the first Man, the progenitor of the human race. The word signifies form, shape, or suitable form; hence, species. As a verb, the word signifies, in Ethiopic, to please or be agreeable; in Arabic, to join, unite, or be accordant, to agree. It is evidently connected with דמה damah, Heb. Ch. Syr. to be like or equal, to form an image, to assimilate. Whence the sense of likeness, image, form, shape; Gr. δεμας, a body, like. [See MAN.]

Adam's apple, a species of citron, [See CITRON;] also the prominent part of the throat, so called from an idle notion, that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat, and occasioned this tumour, which in reality is only the convex part of the first cartilage of the larynx.

Adam's needle, the popular name of the yucca, a plant of four species, cultivated in gardens. Of the roots, the Indians make a kind of bread. [See YUCCA.]

AD'AMANT, n. [Gr. αδαμας; L. adamas; a word of Celtic origin; W. ehedvaen, a loadstone, from ehed, to fly or move, and vaen, or maen, a stone. Chaucer uses adamant for the loadstone. See DIAMOND.] Literally, that which cannot be tamed, subdued, broken; a word no longer employed as a scientific term, but chiefly as a poetical expression synonymous with diamond, or as descriptive of some other hard precious substance, or merely to convey an idea of extreme hardness. The name has often been given to the loadstone; but in modern mineralogy it has no technical signification.

ADAMANTE'AN, a. Hard as adamant.

ADAMANT'INE, a. Made of adamant; having the qualities of adamant; that cannot be broken, dissolved, or penetrated; as, adamantine bonds, or chains.

Adamantine Spar, a genus of earths, of three varieties. The colour of the first is gray, with shades of brown or green; the form, when regular, a hexangular prism, two sides large and four small, without a pyramid; its surface striated, and with a thin covering of white mica, interspersed with particles of red felspar; its fracture, foliaceous and sparry. The second variety is whiter, and the texture more foliaceous. The third variety is of a reddish brown colour. This stone is very hard, and of difficult fusion.—2. A variety of corundum.

AD'AMIC, a. Pertaining to Adam. Adamic earth, is the term given to common red clay, so called by means of a mistaken opinion that Adam means red earth.

AD'AMITES, in Church history, a sect of visionaries, who pretended to establish a state of innocence, and, like Adam, went naked. They abhorred marriage, holding it to be the effect of sin. Several attempts have been made to revive this sect; one as late as the fifteenth century.

ADAMIT'IC, a. Like the Adamites.

ADANSO'NIA, n. Ethiopian sour gourd, monkey's bread, or African calabash-tree. It is a genus of one species, called baobab, a native of Africa, and one of the largest of the vegetable kingdom. The stem rises not above twelve or fifteen feet, but is from sixty-five to seventy-eight feet in circumference. The branches shoot horizontally to the length of sixty feet, the ends bending to the ground. The fruit is oblong, pointed at both ends, ten inches in length, and covered with a greenish down, under which is a hard ligneous rind. It hangs to the tree by a pedicle two feet long, and contains a white spongy substance. The leaves and bark, dried and powdered, are used by the negroes as pepper on their food, to promote perspiration. The tree is named from M. Adanson, who has given a description of it.

AD'APIS, n. [α and δαπις.] Among geologists, an extinct species of an extinct genus of pachydermata, or thick-skinned animals. It was about three times the size of a hedge-hog, and nearly resembled that animal.

ADAPT', v. t. [Sp. adaptar; L. ad and apto, to fit; Gr. απτω.] To make suitable; to fit or suit; as, to adapt an instrument to its uses; we have provision adapted to our wants. It is applied to things material or immaterial.

ADAPTABIL'ITY, } n. The quality
ADAPT'ABLENESS, } of being capable of adaptation.

ADAPT'ABLE, a. That may be adapted.

ADAPTA'TION, n. The act of making suitable, or the state of being suitable, or fit; fitness.

ADAPT'ED, pp. Suited; made suitable; fitted.

ADAPT'EDNESS, n. State of being adapted; suitableness.

ADAPT'ER. See ADOPT'ER, in chemistry.

ADAPT'ING, ppr. Suiting; making fit.

ADAP'TION, n. Adaptation; the act of fitting. [Lit. us., and hardly legitimate.]

ADAPT'NESS,† n. A state of being fitted.

A'DAR, n. A Hebrew month, answering to the latter part of February and the beginning of March, the twelfth of the sacred and sixth of the civil year; so named from אדר adar, to become glorious, from the exuberance of vegetation, in that month, in Egypt and Palestine.

Ad arbit'rium; [L.] at will or pleasure.

ADAR'CE, n. [Gr. αδαρκης.] A saltish concretion on reeds and grass in marshy grounds in Galatia. It is lax and porous, like bastard sponge, and used to clear the skin in leprosy, tetters, &c.

ADAR'CON, n. In Jewish antiquity, a gold coin worth about twenty-five shillings sterling. The distinguishing mark of the piece was a crowned archer.
ADAR'ME, n. A Spanish weight, the sixteenth of an ounce; Fr. demi-gros. The Spanish ounce is seven per cent. lighter than that of Paris.
AD'ATIS, n. A muslin or species of cotton cloth from India. It is fine and clear; the piece is ten French ells long, and three quarters wide.
ADAUNT',† v. t. To subdue. [See DAUNT.]
ADAW',† v. t. To daunt; to subject.
ADAYS, adv. On or in days; as in the phrase, now adays.
Ad captandum, [L.] To captivate; ad captandum vulgus, to please and attract the populace.
ADCOR'PORATE, v. t. To unite one body with another.
ADD, v. t. [L. addo from ad and do, to give.] 1. To set or put together, join, or unite; as, one thing or sum to another, in an aggregate; as, add three to four, the sum is seven.—2. To unite in idea or consideration; to subjoin; as, to what has been alleged, let this argument be added.—3. To increase number.

Thou shalt add three cities more of refuge; Deut. xix.

4. To augment.

Rehoboam said, I will add to your yoke; 1 Kings xii.

As here used, the verb is intransitive, but there may be an ellipsis.
To add to, is used in Scripture as equivalent to give, or bestow upon; Gen. xxx.; Matt. vi. In Gal. ii. the word is understood to signify instruction: "In conference they added nothing to me." In narration, he or they added, is elliptical; he added words, or what follows, or he continued his discourse. In general, when used of things, add implies a principal thing, to which a smaller is to be annexed, as a part of the whole sum, mass, or number.
ADDEC'IMATE, v. t. [L. ad and decimus, tenth.] To take, or to ascertain tithes.
ADD'ED, pp. Joined in place, in sum, in mass or aggregate, in number, in idea, or consideration; united; put together.
ADDEEM', v. t. [See DEEM.] To award; to sentence. [Lit. us.]
Addendum, plu. addenda. [L.] Things to be added; an addition or an appendix to a work.
AD'DER, n. [Sax. ætter or ættor, a serpent and poison; Qu. Sax. nædre, a serpent; W. neider; L. natrix, a serpent.] A venomous serpent or viper, of several species.

Common Adder, or Viper.

AD'DER-FLY, n. A name of the dragon-fly or Libellula; sometimes called adder-bolt.
AD'DER'S-GRASS, n. A plant about which serpents lurk.
AD'DER'S-TONGUE, n. A plant whose seeds are produced on a spike resembling a serpent's tongue.
AD'DER'S-WORT, n. Snakeweed, so named from its supposed virtue in curing the bite of serpents.
ADDIBIL'ITY, n. The possibility of being added.
AD'DIBLE, a. [See ADD.] That may be added.
AD'DICE,† [See ADZ.]
ADDICT', a. Addicted. [Not mu. us.]
ADDICT', v. t. [L. addico, to devote, from ad and dico, to dedicate.] To apply one's self habitually; to devote time and attention by customary or constant practice. Sometimes in a good sense.

They have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints; 1 Cor. xv.

More usually, in a bad sense, to follow customarily, or devote, by habitually practising that which is ill; as, a man is addicted to intemperance.
To addict one's self to a person, a sense borrowed from the Romans, who used the word for assigning debtors in service to their creditors,—is found in Ben Jonson, but is not legitimate in English.
ADDICT'ED, pp. Devoted by customary practice.
ADDICT'EDNESS, n. The quality or state of being addicted.
ADDICT'ING, ppr. Devoting time and attention; practising customarily.
ADDIC'TION, n. The act of devoting or giving up in practice; the state of being devoted.

His addiction was to courses vain. Shak.

2. Among the Romans, a making over goods to another by sale or legal sentence; also an assignment of debtors in service to their creditors.
ADD'ING, ppr. Joining; putting together; increasing.
ADDIT'AMENT, n. [L. additamentum, from additus and ment. See ADD.] An addition, or rather the thing added, as furniture in a house; any material mixed with the principal ingredient in a compound. Ancient anatomists gave the name to an epiphysis, or junction of bones without articulation. [Lit. us. in either sense.]
ADDI'TION, n. [L. additio, from addo.] 1. The act of adding, opposed to subtraction, or diminution; as, a sum is increased by addition.—2. Any thing added, whether material or immaterial. —3. In arith., the uniting of two or more numbers in one sum; also the rule or branch of arithmetic which treats of adding numbers. Simple addition is the joining of sums of the same denomination, as pounds to pounds, shillings to shillings, &c. Compound addition is the joining of sums of different denominations, as, pounds, shillings and pence.—4. In law, a title annexed to a man's name, to show his rank, occupation, or place of residence; as, John Doe, Esq.; Richard Roe, Gent.; Robert Dale, Mason; Thomas Way, of Glasgow. In Scots law, the term designation has the same signification.—5. In mus., a dot at the side of a note, to lengthen its sound one half. —6. In her., something added to a coat of arms, as a mark of honour, opposed to abatements; as, bordure, quarter, canton, gyron, pile, &c. See these terms. —7. In distilling, any thing added to the wash or liquor in a state of fermentation.—8. In pop. lan., an advantage, ornament, improvement; that is, an addition by way of eminence.
ADDI''TIONAL, a. That is added. It is used by Bacon for addition; but improperly.
ADDI''TIONALLY, adv. By way of addition.
ADD'ITIVE, a. That may be added, or that is to be added, something to be added, in contradistinction to subtractive, which denotes something to be taken away.
ADD'ITORY, a. That adds, or may add.
AD'DLE, a. [W. hadyl, corrupt; hadlu, to decay, to putrify; Heb. חדל hadal, to fail, Ar. hadala, to decline, and chadala, to frustrate, to fail, to cease. Sax. aidlian, to be empty or vain.] In a morbid state; putrid; applied to eggs. Hence, barren, producing nothing.

His brains grow addle. Dryden.

AD'DLE, v. t. To make corrupt or morbid.
AD'DLED, a. Morbid, corrupt, putrid, or barren.
AD'DLE-PATED, a. Having empty brains.
ADDOOM', v. t. [See DOOM.] To adjudge.
ADDORS'ED, a. [L. ad and dorsum, the back.] In her., having the backs turned to each other, as beasts. [See ADORSED.]
ADDRESS', v. t. [Fr. adresser; to direct, to make straight. This is supposed to be from L. dirigo. See DRESS.] 1. To prepare; to make suitable dispositions for.

Turnus addressed his men to single fight. Dryden.

The archangel and the evil spirit addressing themselves for the combat. Addison.

[This sense is, I believe, obsolete or little used.] 2. To direct words or discourse; to apply to by words; as, to address a discourse to an assembly; to address the judges.—3. To direct in writing, as a letter; or to direct and transmit; as, he addressed a letter to the speaker. Sometimes it is used with the reciprocal pronoun; as, he addressed himself to the speaker, instead of, he addressed his discourse. The phrase is faulty; but less so than the following: To such I would address with this most affectionate petition.

The latter is admissible in poetry, as an elliptical phrase.—4. To present an address, as a letter of thanks or congratulation, a petition, or a testimony of respect.—5. To court or make suit as a lover.—6. In com., to consign or intrust to the care of another, as agent or factor; as the ship was addressed to a merchant in Baltimore.
ADDRESS', n. A speaking to; verbal application; a formal manner of speech; —2. A written or formal application; a message of respect, congratulation, thanks, petition, &c.; as, an address of thanks;—3. Manner of speaking to another; as, a man of pleasing address.— 4. Courtship; more generally in the plural, addresses; as, he makes or pays his addresses to a lady.—5. Skill; dexterity; skilful management; as, the envoy conducted the negociation with address.—6. Direction of a letter, including the name, title, and place of residence of the person for whom it is intended. Hence these particulars are denominated a man's address.
ADDRESS'ED, pp. Spoken or applied to; directed; courted; consigned.
ADDRESS'ER, n. One who addresses or petitions.
ADDRESS'ING, ppr. Speaking or applying to; directing; courting; consigning.
ADDUCE, v. t. [L. adduco, to lead or bring to; ad and duco, to lead. See DUKE.] 1. To bring forward, present or offer; as, a witness was adduced to prove the fact.—2. To cite, name, or introduce; as, to adduce an authority or an argument.

ADDUCED, pp. Brought forward; cited; alleged in argument.

ADDU'CENT, a. Bringing forward or together; a word applied to those muscles of the body which pull one part toward another. [See ADDUCTOR.]

ADDU'CER, n. One that adduces.

ADDU'CIBLE, a. That may be adduced.

ADDUCING, ppr. Bringing forward; citing in argument.

ADDUC'TION, n. The act of bringing forward.

ADDUC'TIVE, a. That brings forward.

ADDUC'TOR, n. [L.] A muscle which draws one part of the body toward another; as, the adductor oculi, which turns the eye toward the nose; the adductor pollicis manûs, which draws the thumb toward the fingers.

ADDULCE,† v. t. (adduls'.) [L. ad and dulcis, sweet.] To sweeten.

AD'EB, n. An Egyptian weight of 210 okes, each of three rotolos, which is a weight of about two drams less than the English pound. But at Rosetta, the adeb is only 150 okes.

ADELANTA'DO, n. [Spanish.] A governor of a province; a lieutenant governor.

AD'ELING, n. A title of honour, given by our Saxon ancestors to the children of princes, and to young nobles. It is composed of adel or rather æthel, the Teutonic term for noble, illustrious, and ling, young posterity. We observe the term in many Saxon names of princes, as Ethelwolf, noble wolf, or noble help, Ethelbald, noble, bold, Ethelbert, noble brightness. Ar. athala, to be well-rooted, to be of noble stock or birth.

AD'ELITE, n. Adelites or Almoganens, in Spain, were conjurors, who predicted the fortunes of individuals by the flight and singing of birds, and other accidental circumstances.

ADEL'OPODE, n. [Gr. α priv. δηλος, apparent, and πους, foot.] An animal whose feet are not apparent.

ADELPH'IA, n. [αδελφος, a brother.] A collection of stamens into a bundle; a term employed by Linnæus for those plants in which the stamens, instead of growing singly, combine into one or more parcels, or brotherhoods. [See MONADELPH, DIADELPH, &c.]

Adelphia.

ADEMP'TION, n. [L. adimo, to take away; of ad and emo, to take.] In the civil law, the revocation of a grant, donation, or the like.

ADENOG'RAPHY, n [Gr. αδην, a gland, and γραφω, to describe.] That part of anatomy which treats of the glands.

AD'ENOID, a. [Gr. αδην, a gland, and ειδος, form.] In the form of a gland: glandiform; applied to the prostrate glands.

ADENOLOG'ICAL, a. Pertaining to the doctrine of the glands.

ADENOL'OGY, n. [Gr. αδην, a gland, and λογος, discourse.] In anat., the doctrine of the glands, their nature, and their uses.

AD'ENOS, n. A species of cotton, from Aleppo, called also marine cotton.

AD'ENOSE, } a. Like, or appertaining
AD'ENOUS, } a gland.

ADENOT'OMY, n. [Gr. αδην, a gland, and τομη, a cutting.] In anat. and surg., a cutting or incision of a gland.

ADEPT', n. [L. adeptus, obtained, from adipiscor.] One fully skilled or well versed in any art. The term is borrowed from the Alchymists, who applied it to one who pretended to have found the philosopher's stone, or the panacea.

ADEPT', a. Well skilled; completely versed or acquainted with.

ADEP'TION,† n. [L. adeptio.] An obtaining; acquirement.

ADEPT'IST, n. An adept.

AD'EQUACY, n. [L. adæquatus, of ad and æquatus, made equal.] The state or quality of being equal to, proportionate, or sufficient; a sufficiency for a particular purpose.

The adequacy of supply to the expenditure. War in Disguise.

AD'EQUATE, a. Equal; proportionate; correspondent to; fully sufficient; as, means adequate to the object; we have no adequate ideas of infinite power.

Adequate ideas are such as exactly represent their object.

AD'EQUATE,† v. t. To resemble exactly.

AD'EQUATELY, adv. In an adequate manner; in exact proportion; with just correspondence, representation, or proportion; in a degree equal to the object.

AD'EQUATENESS, n. The state of being adequate; justness of proportion or representation; sufficiency.

ADEQUA'TION,† n. Adequateness.

ADER'AIMIN, or ALDER'AIMIN, n. A star of the third magnitude in the left shoulder of Cepheus.

ADESSENA'RIANS, n. [L. adesse, to be present.] In Church hist., a sect who hold the real presence of Christ's body in the eucharist, but not by transubstantiation. They differ, however, as to this presence; some holding the body of Christ to be in the bread; others, about the bread.

ADFECT'ED, a. In alge., compounded; consisting of different powers of the unknown quantity. An adfected or affected equation in alge., is one in which the unknown quantity is found in two or more different degrees or powers; thus, $x^3 - px^2 + qx = a$, is an adfected equation, as it contains three different powers of the unknown quantity x.

ADFIL'IATED, a. Adopted as a son. [See AFFILIATE.]

ADFILIA'TION, n. [L. ad and filius, a son.] A Gothic custom, by which the children of a former marriage are put upon the same footing with those of a succeeding one; still retained in some parts of Germany.

Ad finem. [L.] To the end.

ADHERE, v. i. [L. adhæreo, ad and hæreo, to stick.] 1. To stick to, as glutinous substances, or by natural growth; as, the lungs sometimes adhere to the pleura. —2. To be joined, or held in contact; to cleave to.—3. Figuratively, to hold to, be attached, or remain fixed, either by personal union or conformity of faith, principle, or opinion; as, men adhere to a party, a leader, a church, or creed. —4. To be consistent; to hold together as the parts of a system.

Every thing adheres together. Shak.

ADHERENCE, n. The quality or state of sticking or adhering.—2. Figuratively, a being fixed in attachment; fidelity; steady attachment; as, an adherence to a party or opinions.

Adherence in Scots law, is an action by which it is competent, either for a husband or wife, to compel the other party to adhere in case of desertion.

ADHE'RENCY, n. The same as Adherence. In the sense of that which adheres, not legitimate.

ADHE'RENT, a. Sticking, uniting, as glue or wax; united with; as, "an adherent mode" in Locke, that is, a mode accidentally joined with an object, as wetness in a cloth.

ADHE'RENT, n. The person who adheres; one who follows a leader, party, or profession; a follower, or partisan; a believer in a particular faith or church. In the sense of an appendage, obsolete.

ADHE'RENTLY, adv. In an adherent manner.

ADHE'RER, n. One that adheres; an adherent.

ADHE'SION, n. (adhe'zhun.) [L. adhæsio.] 1. The act or state of sticking, or being united and attached to; as the adhesion of glue, or of parts united by growth, cement, and the like. Adhesion is generally used in a literal; Adherence, in a metaphorical sense.—2. Sometimes figuratively, adherence, union or steady attachment; firmness in opinion; as, an adhesion to vice; but in this sense nearly obsolete. The union of bodies by attraction is usually denominated cohesion. In phys. sci., Adhesion means generally the tendency which heterogeneous bodies have to remain attached to each other, when their surfaces are brought into contact; but in some instances it may be considered as little, if at all, different from cohesion, which serves to unite the particles of the same kind of matter. Adhesion may take place between two solids as two plates of glass, or between a solid and a fluid, or between two fluids. Adhesion, in surg., is the reunion of parts that have been divided by a particular kind of inflammation, called the adhesive. In path., the morbid union, on account of adhesive in anmation, of parts naturally contiguous but not adherent.

ADHE'SIVE, a. Sticky; tenacious, as glutinous substances; apt or tending to adhere. Thus gums are adhesive. Adhesive plaster, in surg., is a plaster made of common litharge plaster and resin.

ADHE'SIVELY, adv. In an adhesive manner.

ADHE'SIVENESS, n. The quality of sticking or adhering; stickiness; tenacity.—2. Among phrenologists, one of the mental propensities. Its organ is situated on each side of concentrativeness, higher up than philoprogenitiveness. Its function is to produce the instinctive tendency of attachment to objects animate and inanimate. It is strongest in females, and when very weak, the individual has little or no attachment to mankind.

ADHIB'IT, v. t. [L. adhibeo, ad and habeo, to have.] To use, or apply. [Rarely used.]

ADHIBI''TION, n. Application; use.

AD'HIL, n. A star of the sixth magnitude, upon the garment of Andromeda, under the last star in her foot.

Ad hominem, [L. ad, to, and homo, man.] To the man; to the interests or passions of the man. In logic, an argumentum ad hominem is an argument drawn from the belief or principles of those with whom we argue, by which their own errors and prejudices are turned against themselves.

ADHORTA'TION, n. [L. adhortatio.] Advice. [Seld. us.]

ADHORT'ATORY, a. [L. adhortor, to advise, ad and hortor.] Advisory; containing counsel or warning.

ADIAPH'ORISTS, n. [Gr. ἀδιάφορος, indifferent.] Moderate Lutherans; a name given in the sixteenth century, to certain men that followed Melanchthon, who was more pacific than Luther. The Adiaphorists held some opinions and ceremonies to be indifferent, which Luther condemned as sinful or heretical.

ADIAPH'OROUS, a. Indifferent; neutral; a name given by Boyle to a spirit distilled from tartar, and some other vegetable substances, neither acid nor alkaline, or not possessing the distinct character of any chemical body.

ADIEU', (adu') [Fr. à Dieu, to God; a compound word, and an elliptical form of speech, for I commend you to God. It is called an adverb, but it has none of the properties of a modifying word.] Farewell; an expression of kind wishes at the parting of friends.

ADIEU', n. A farewell, or commendation to the care of God; as, an everlasting adieu.

Ad indefinitum, [L.] To any indefinite extent.

Ad infinitum, [L.] To endless extent.

Ad inquirendum, [L.] In law, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made of any matter, relating to a cause depending in the King's court.

Ad interim, [L.] In the mean time; for the present.

AD'INOLE, n. See PETROSILEX.

ADIPO'CERATE, v. t. To convert into adipocere.

ADIPOCERA'TION, n. The act or process of being changed into adipocere.

ADIPOCÈRE, n. [L. adeps, fat, and cera, Fr. cire, wax.] A soft unctuous or waxy substance of a light brown colour, into which the muscular fibres of dead animal bodies are converted, when protected from atmospheric air, and under certain circumstances of temperature and humidity. This substance was first discovered by Fourcroy, in the burying-ground of the Church des Innocens, when it was removed in 1787. Adipocere is speedily produced, when the body is immersed in running water.

Adipocère mineral, n. A fatty matter found in the argillaceous iron-ore of Merthyr. It is inodorous when cold, but when heated it emits a slightly bituminous odour.

AD'IPOSE, a. [L. adiposus, from adeps, fat. Qu. Ch. טפש, taphash, to grow fat; Heb. and Ch. fat, gross, stupid; Ar. tafashan, fat, bulky.] Fat. The adipose membrane is the cellular membrane, containing the fat in its cells. The adipose cells are the bags which contain the fat. Fat sometimes accumulates in large quantities, and forms swellings, which are called in pathology adipose tumours.

AD'IT, n. [L. aditus, from adeo, aditum, to approach, ad and eo, to go.] An entrance or passage; a term in mining, used to denote the opening by which a mine is entered, or by which water and ores are carried away. It is usually made in the side of a hill. The word is sometimes used for air-shaft, but not with strict propriety.

ADJA'CENCY, n. [L. adjaceo, to lie contiguous, from ad and jaceo, to lie.] The state of lying close or contiguous; a bordering upon, or lying next to; as, the adjacency of lands or buildings. In the sense of that which is adjacent, as used by Brown, it is not legitimate.

ADJA'CENT, a. Lying near, close, or contiguous; bordering upon; as, a field adjacent to the highway. Adjacent angles. [See ANGLE.]

ADJA'CENT, n. That which is next to or contiguous. [Lit. us.]

ADJA'CENTLY, adv. So as to be adjacent.

ADJECT', v. t. [L. adjicio, of ad and jacio, to throw.] To add or put, as one thing to another.

ADJEC'TION, n. The act of adding, or thing added. [Lit. us.]

ADJECTI''TIOUS, a. Added.

AD'JECTIVE, n. In gram., a word used with a noun, to express a quality of the thing named, or something attributed to it, or to limit or define it, or to specify or describe a thing, as distinct from something else. It is called also an attributive or attribute. Thus, in the phrase, A wise ruler, wise is the adjective or attribute, expressing a particular property of ruler.

Adjective colours, colours which require to be fixed by some base or mordant, in order to be applied as permanent dye-stuffs.

AD'JECTIVELY, adv. In the manner of an adjective; as, a word is used adjectively.

ADJOIN', v. t. [Fr. adjoindre; L. adjungo, ad and jungo. See JOIN.] To join or unite to; to put to, by placing in contact; to unite, by fastening together with a joint, mortise, or knot. But in these transitive senses, it is rarely used. [See JOIN.]

ADJOIN', v. i. To lie or be next to, or in contact; to be contiguous; as, a farm adjoining to the highway. This is the common use of the word, and to is often omitted; as, adjoining the highway.

ADJOIN'ANT,† a. Contiguous to.

ADJOIN'ED, pp. Joined to; united.

ADJOIN'ING, ppr. Joining to; adjacent, contiguous.

ADJOURN', v. t. (adjurn'). [Fr., ajourner, from journée, a day, or day's work, or journey. See JOURNAL, JOURNEY.] Literally, to put off, or defer to another day; but now used to denote a formal intermission of business, a putting off to any future meeting of the same body, and appropriately used of public bodies or private commissioners, intrusted with business; as, the court adjourned the consideration of the question.

ADJOURN', v. i. To suspend business for a time; as, from one day to another, or for a longer period, usually public business, as of legislatures and courts, for repose or refreshment; as, the House of Commons adjourned at four o'clock. It is also used for the act of closing the session of a public body; as, the court adjourned without day.

It was moved that parliament should adjourn for six weeks. Select Speeches, vol. v. 403.

ADJOURNED, pp. Put off, delayed, or deferred for a limited time.—2. As an adjective, existing or held by adjournment; as, an adjourned session of a court, opposed to stated or regular.

ADJOURN'ING, ppr. Deferring; suspending for a time; closing a session.

ADJOURN'MENT, n. The act of adjourning; as, in legislatures.—2. The putting off till another day or time specified, or without day; that is, the closing of a session of a public or official body.—3. The time or interval during which a public body defers business; as, during an adjournment. But a suspension of business, between the forming of a House and an adjournment for refreshment, is called a recess. In Great Britain, the close of a session of parliament is called a prorogation; as the close of a parliament is a dissolution. But in Great Britain, as well as in the United States, adjournment is now used for an intermission of business for any length of time; as, an adjournment of parliament for six weeks.

ADJUDG'E, v. t. [Fr. adjuger, from juge, judge. See JUDGE.] To decide, or determine, in the case of a controverted question; to decree by a judicial opinion; used appropriately of courts of law and equity; as, the case was adjudged in Hilary term; the prize was adjudged to the victor; a criminal was adjudged to suffer death. It has been used in the sense of to judge; as, he adjudged him unworthy of his friendship. But this sense is unusual.

ADJUDG'ED, pp. Determined by judicial opinion; decreed; sentenced.

ADJUDG'ING, ppr. Determining by judicial opinion: sentencing.

ADJUDG'MENT, n. The act of judging; sentence.

ADJU'DICATE, v. t. [L. adjudico, to give sentence. See JUDGE.] To adjudge; to try and determine, as a court. It has the sense of adjudge.

ADJU'DICATE, v. i. To try and determine upon judicially; as, the court adjudicated upon the case.

ADJU'DICATED, pp. Adjudged; tried and decided.

ADJU'DICATING, ppr. Adjudging; trying and determining.

ADJUDICA'TION, n. The act of adjudging; the act or process of trying and determining judicially; as, a ship was taken and sent into port for adjudication.—2. A judicial sentence; judgment or decision of a court.

Whose families were parties to some of the former adjudications. Blackstone.

3. In Scots law, an action by which a creditor attaches the heritable estate of his debtor, or his debtor's heir, in payment or security of his debt; or an action by which the holder of a heritable right, labouring under a defect in point of form, may supply that defect.

AD'JUMENT,† n. [L. adjumentum.] Help; support.

AD'JUNCT, n. [L. adjunctus, joined, from adjungo. See JOIN.] 1. Something added to another, but not essentially a part of it; as, water absorbed by a cloth or sponge is its adjunct. Also a person joined to another.—2. In metaph., a quality of the body or the mind, whether natural or acquired; as, colour, in the body; thinking, in the mind.—3. In gram., words added to illustrate or amplify the force of other words; as, the History of the American revolution. The words in Italics are the adjuncts of History.—4. In mus., the word is employed to denominate the relation between the principal mode and the modes of its two fifths. The adjunct deities, among the Romans, were inferior deities, which were added as assistants to the principal gods; as, Bellona, to Mars; to Vulcan, the Cabiri; to the Good Genius, the Lares; to the Evil, the Lemures. In the Institute of France, adjoints, or adjunct members, are a kind of supplementary members, in addition to the chief or free members, similar in rank to English associates. In England, adjunct has been used for a colleague, but rarely.

AD'JUNCT, a. Added to or united with; as, an adjunct professor.

ADJUNC'TION, n. The act of joining; the thing joined.

ADJUNC'TIVE, a. Joining; having the quality of joining.

ADJUNC'TIVE, n. That which is joined.

ADJUNCTLY, adv. In connection with; consequently.

ADJURA'TION, n. The act of adjuring; a solemn charging on oath, or under the penalty of a curse.—2. The form of oath.

ADJURE, v. t. [L. adjuro, to swear solemnly, or compel one to swear; from ad and juro, to swear.] 1. To charge, bind, or command on oath, or under the penalty of a curse.

Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city of Jericho; Josh. vi.

2. To charge earnestly and solemnly, on pain of God's wrath.

I adjure thee by the living God; Matt. xxvi.; Acts xix.

3. To conjure; to charge, urge, or summon with solemnity.

The magistrates adjured by all the bonds of civil duty. Milton.

Ye sacred stars, be all of you adjured. Dryden

ADJURED, pp. Charged on oath, or with a denunciation of God's wrath; solemnly urged.

ADJURER, n. One that adjures; one that exacts an oath.

ADJURING, ppr. Charging on oath, or on the penalty of a curse; beseeching with solemnity.

ADJUST', v. t. [Sp. adjustar; Fr. ajuster, to fit or frame; of L. ad, and justus, just, exact. See JUST.] 1. To make exact; to fit; to make correspondent, or conformable; as, to adjust a garment to the body, an event to the prediction, or things to a standard.—2. To put in order; to regulate or reduce to system; as, to adjust a scheme; to adjust affairs.—3. To make accurate; to settle or bring to a satisfactory state, so that parties are agreed in the result; as, to adjust accounts; the differences are adjusted.

ADMEAS'URED, pp. Measured; apportioned.

ADMEAS'UREMENT, n. The measuring of dimensions by a rule, as of a ship, cask, and the like.—2. The measure of a thing, or dimensions ascertained. In these uses the word is equivalent to measurement, mensuration, and measure.—3. The adjustment of proportion, or ascertainment of shares, as of dower or pasture held in common. This is done by writ of admeasurement, directed to the sheriff.

ADMEAS'URER, n. One that admeasures.

ADMEAS'URING, ppr. Measuring; apportioning.

ADMENSURA'TION, is equivalent to admeasurement, but not much used. [See MENSURATION.]

ADMIN'ICLE,† n. [L. adminiculum.] Help; support.

Adminicle is a term of Scots law, used in the action of proving the tenor of a lost deed, and signifies any deed or even scroll tending to establish the existence or terms of the deed in question.

ADMINIC'ULAR, a. Supplying help; helpful.

ADMIN'ISTER, v. t. [L. administro, of ad and ministro, to serve or manage. See MINISTER.] 1. To act as minister or chief agent, in managing public affairs, under laws or a constitution of government, as a king, president, or other supreme officer. It is used also of absolute monarchs, who rule not in subordination; but is more strictly applicable to limited monarchs, and other supreme executive officers, and to governors, viceroys, judges, and the like, who are under the authority of laws. A king or a president administers the government or laws, when he executes them, or carries them into effect. A judge administers the laws, when he applies them to particular cases or persons. In short, to administer is to direct the execution or application of laws.—2. To dispense, as, to administer justice or the sacrament.—3. To afford; to give or furnish; as, to administer relief, that is, to act as the agent. To administer medicine, is to direct and cause it to be taken.—4. To give, as an oath; to cause to swear according to law.

ADMIN'ISTER, v. i. To contribute; to bring aid or supplies; to add something; as, a shade administers to our comfort.—2. To perform the office of administrator; as, A administers upon the estate of B.

ADMIN'ISTERED, pp. Executed; managed; governed; afforded; given; dispensed.

ADMINISTE'RIAL, a. Pertaining to administration, or to the executive part of government.

ADMIN'ISTERING, ppr. Executing; carrying into effect; giving; dispensing.

ADMIN'ISTRATE, in the place of Administer, has been used, but is not well authorised.

ADMINISTRA'TION, n. The act of administering; direction; management; government of public affairs; the conducting of any office or employment.—2. The executive part of government, consisting in the exercise of the constitutional and legal powers, the general superintendence of national affairs, and the enforcement of laws.—3. The persons collectively, who are intrusted with the execution of laws and the superintendence of public affairs; the chief magistrate and his council; or the council alone, as in Great Britain.—4. Dispensation; distribution; exhibition; as, the administration of justice, of the sacrament, or of grace; 1 Cor. xii.; 2 Cor. ix.—5. The management of the estate of an intestate person, under a commission from the proper authority. This management consists in collecting debts, paying debts and legacies, and distributing the property among the heirs.—6. The power, office, or commission of an administrator.

It is more usual to say letters of administration. Blackstone.

7. This name is given by the Spaniards to the staple magazine or warehouse at Callao, in Peru, where foreign ships must unload.

ADMIN'ISTRATIVE, a. That administers, or by which one administers.

ADMINISTRA'TOR, n. A man who, by virtue of a commission from the ordinary, surrogate, court of probate, or other proper authority, has the charge of the goods and estate of one dying without a will.—2. One who administers, or who directs, manages, distributes, or dispenses laws and rites, either in civil, judicial, political, or ecclesiastical affairs.—3. In Scots law, a tutor, curator, or guardian, having the care of one who is incapable of acting for himself. The term is usually applied to a father who has power over his children and their estate during their minority.

ADMINISTRA'TORSHIP, n. The office of an administrator.

ADMINISTRA'TRIX, n. A female who administers upon the estate of an intestate; also a female who administers government.

AD'MIRABLE, a. [L. admirabilis.] To be admired; worthy of admiration; having qualities to excite wonder, with approbation, esteem, or reverence; used of persons or things; as, the admirable structure of the body, or of the universe.

AD'MIRABLENESS, n. The quality of being admirable; the power of exciting admiration.

AD'MIRABLY, adv. In a manner to excite wonder, mingled with approbation, esteem, or veneration.

AD'MIRAL, n. [In the Latin of the middle ages, amira, amiras, admiralis, an emir; Sp. almirante; Fr. amiral; from Ar. amara, to command; Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. אמר, amer, to speak. The terminating syllable of admiral may be ἁλς, the sea. This word is said to have been introduced into Europe by the Turks, Genoese, or Venetians, in the 12th or 13th century.] A marine commander in chief; the commander of a fleet or navy. 1. The lord high admiral, in Great Britain, is an officer who superintends all maritime affairs, and has the government of the navy. He has also jurisdiction over all maritime causes, and commissions the naval officers.—2. The admiral of the fleet, the highest officer under the Admiralty. When he embarks on an expedition, the union flag is displayed at the main top gallant mast head.—3. The vice admiral, an officer next in rank and command to the admiral, has command of the second squadron. He carries his flag at the fore top gallant mast head. This name is given also to certain officers who have power to hold courts of vice-admiralty, in various parts of the British dominions.—4. The rear admiral, next in rank to the vice admiral, has command of the third squadron, and carries his flag at the mizen top gallant mast head.—5. The commander of any single fleet, or in general any flag officer.—6. The ship which carries the admiral; also the most considerable ship of a fleet of merchantmen, or of fishing vessels.—7. In zool., a species of shell-fish. [See VOLUTA.]—8. A species of butterfly, which lays her eggs on the great stinging nettle, and delights in brambles.

AD'MIRALSHIP, n. The office or power of an admiral. [Lit. us.]

AD'MIRALTY, n. In Great Britain, the office of lord high admiral. This office is discharged by one person, or by commissioners, called lords of the admiralty; usually seven in number.

The admiralty court, or court of admiralty, is the supreme court for the trial of maritime causes, held before the lord high admiral, or lords of the admiralty.

In Scotland there is a court of admiralty, with very extensive civil and criminal jurisdiction, in all maritime and seafaring causes within the realm. The lord high admiral of Scotland, by an act passed in 1689, is declared to be his majesty's justice-general upon the seas, and in all ports, harbours, or creeks, and upon navigable rivers, below the first bridges, or within flood-mark.

In general, a court of admiralty is a court for the trial of causes arising on the high seas, as prize causes and the like. In the United States, there is no admiralty court, distinct from others; but the district courts, established in the several states by Congress, are invested with admiralty powers.

ADMIRA'TION, n. Wonder mingled with pleasing emotions, as approbation, esteem, love, or veneration; a compound emotion excited by something novel, rare, great, or excellent; applied to persons and their works. It often includes a slight degree of surprise. Thus, we view the solar system with admiration.

Very near to admiration is the wish to admire. Anon.

It has been sometimes used in an ill sense, denoting wonder with disapprotion.

When I saw her I wondered with great admiration; Luke xvii.

ADMIRE, v. t. [L. admiror, ad and miror, to wonder; Fr. admirer; W. mir, visage; also fair, comely; and maer, one that looks after, keeps, or guards, a mayor, or bailiff. The primary sense is to hold, to stop, or restrain. Ch. and Syr. דמר, demer; L. demoror. See MOOR and MAR.] 1. To regard with wonder or surprise, mingled with approbation, esteem, reverence, or affection.

When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and be admired in all them that believe in that day; 2 Thess. i.

This word has been used in an ill sense, but seems now correctly restricted to the sense here given, and implying something great, rare, or excellent, in the object admired.—2. To regard with affection; a familiar term for to love greatly.

ADMIRE, v. i. To wonder; to be affected with slight surprise; sometimes with at; as, to admire at his own contrivance.

To admire at, sometimes implies disapprobation.

ADMIRED, pp. Regarded with wonder, mingled with pleasurable sensations, as esteem, love, or reverence.

ADMIRER, n. One who admires; one who esteems or loves greatly.

ADMIRING, ppr. Regarding with wonder united with love or esteem.

ADMIRINGLY, adv. With admiration; in the manner of an admirer.

ADMIS'SIBLE, a. [See ADMIT.] That may be admitted, allowed or conceded; as, the testimony is admissible.

ADMIS'SIBLY, adv. So as to be admitted.

ADMIS'SION, n. [L. admissio.] 1. The act or practice of admitting, as the admission of aliens into a country; also the state of being admitted.—2. Admittance; power or permission to enter; entrance; access; power to approach.—3. Admission in the Church of England, denotes the act of a bishop admitting or allowing a clerk to be able or qualified for serving a cure. In the Church of Scotland, admission to a Church is an act of the Presbytery of the bounds admitting a minister to his church, or as the law expresses it, collating him to his benefice.—4. Allowance; grant of an argument or position not fully proved.

ADMIT', v. t. [L. admitto, from ad and mitto, to send; Fr. mettre.] 1. To suffer to enter; to grant entrance; whether into a place, or an office, or into the mind, or consideration; as, to admit a student into college; to admit a serious thought into the mind.—2. To give right of entrance; as, a ticket admits one into a play-house.—3. To allow; to receive as true; as, the argument or fact is admitted.—4. To permit, grant, or allow, or to be capable of; as, the words do not admit of such a construction. In this sense, of may be used after the verb, or omitted.

ADMIT'TABLE, a. That may be admitted or allowed.

ADMIT'TANCE, n. The act of admitting; allowance. More usually,—2. Permission to enter; the power or right of entrance; and hence, actual entrance; as, he gained admittance into the church.—3.† Concession; admission; allowance; as, the admittance of an argument.—4. Shakspeare uses the word for the custom or prerogative of being admitted; "Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance:" but the license is unwarrantable.

ADMIT'TED, pp. Permitted to enter or approach; allowed; granted; conceded.

ADMIT'TER, n. He that admits.

ADMIT'TING, ppr. Permitting to enter or approach; allowing; conceding.

ADMIX', v. t. To mingle with something else. [See MIX.]

ADMIX'TION, n. (admix'chun.) [L. admixtio, or admistio; of ad and misceo, to mix. See MIX.] A mingling of bodies; a union by mixing different substances together. It differs from composition or chemical combination; for admixtion does not alter the nature of the substances mixed, but merely blends them together; whereas in composition, the particles unite by affinity, lose their former properties, and form new compounds, with different properties.

ADMIX'TURE, n. [From ADMIX.] The substance mingled with another, sometimes the act of mixture. We say, an admixture of sulphur with alum, or the admixture of different bodies.

ADMON'ISH, v. t. [L. admoneo, ad and moneo, to teach, warn, admonish; Fr. admonéter; Sax. mænan, to mean.] 1. To warn or notify of a fault; to reprove with mildness.

Count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother; 2 Thess. iii.

2. To counsel against wrong practices; to caution or advise.

Admonish one another in psalms and hymns; Col iii.

3. To instruct or direct.

Moses was admonished by God, when he was about to make the tabernacle; Heb. viii.

4. In ecclesiast. affairs, to reprove a member of the church for a fault, either publicly or privately; the first step of church discipline. It is followed by of or against; as, to admonish of a fault committed, or against committing a fault. It has a like use in colleges.

ADMON'ISHED, pp. Reproved; advised; warned; instructed.

ADON'IC, a. Adonic verse, a short verse, in which the death of Adonis was bewailed. It consists of a dactyl and a spondee or trochee.

ADON'IC, n. An Adonic verse. It consists of a dactyl and a spondee or trochee, as rārā jŭvēntūs, and on account of its animated movement is adapted to gay and lively poetry. It is, however, seldom used by itself, but construed with other kinds of verse. Among the Anglo-Saxons, a poetic verse consisting of one long, two short, and two long syllables.

ADO'NIS, n. In myth., the favourite of Venus, said to be the son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. He was fond of hunting, and received a mortal wound from the tusk of a wild-boar. Venus lamented his death, and changed him into the flower which bears his name.

In bot., the pheasant's eye, a genus of plants belonging to the natural order ranunculaceæ. In the corn Adonis, the petals are bright scarlet, and are considered as emblematical of the blood of Adonis, from which the plant is fabled to have sprung.

ADO'NISTS, n. [Heb. Ch. and Syr. אדון Adon, Lord, a scriptural title of the Supreme Being.] Among critics, a sect or party who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah are not the natural points belonging to that word, and that they do not express the true pronunciation of it; but that they are vowel points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the ineffable name Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to utter, and the true pronunciation of which was lost; they were therefore always to pronounce the word Adonai, instead of Jehovah.

ADOPT', v. t. [L. adopto, of ad and opto, to desire or choose. See OPTION.] 1. To take a stranger into one's family, as son and heir; to take one who is not a child, and treat him as one, giving him a title to the privileges and rights of a child.—2. In a spiritual sense, to receive the sinful children of men into the invisible church, and into God's favour and protection, by which they become heirs of salvation by Christ.—3. To take or receive as one's own, that which is not naturally so; as, to adopt the opinions of another; or to receive that which is new; as, to adopt a particular mode of husbandry.—4. ADOPT'EDLY, adv. In the manner of something adopted.

ADOPT'ER, n. One who adopts.

2. In chem., a large round receiver, with two necks, diametrically opposite to each other, one of which admits the neck of a retort, and the other is joined to another receiver. It is used in distillations, to give more space to elastic vapours, or to increase the length of the neck of a retort.

ADOPT'ING, ppr. Taking a stranger as a son; taking as one's own.

ADOP'TION, n. [L. adoptio.] 1. The act of adopting, or the state of being adopted; the taking and treating of a stranger as one's own child.—2. The receiving as one's own, what is new or not natural.—3. God's taking the sinful children of men into his favour and protection; Eph. iv.

Adoption by arms, an ancient ceremony of presenting arms to one for his merit or valour, which laid the person under an obligation to defend the giver.

Adoption by baptism, is the spiritual affinity which is contracted by godfathers and god-children, in the ceremony of baptism. It was introduced into the Greek church, and afterwards among the ancient Franks. This affinity was supposed to entitle the god-child to a share of the god-father's estate.

Adoption by hair, was performed by cutting off the hair of a person, and giving it to the adoptive father. Thus pope John VIII. adopted Boson, king of Arles.

Adoption by matrimony, is the taking the children of a wife or husband, by a former marriage, into the condition of natural children. This is a practice peculiar to the Germans; but is not so properly adoption as adfiliation.

Adoption by testament, is the appointing of a person to be heir, by will, on condition of his taking the name, arms, &c. of the adopter.

In Europe, adoption is used for many kinds of admission to a more intimate relation, and is nearly equivalent to reception; as, the admission of persons into hospitals or monasteries, or of one society into another.

ADOP'TIONIST, n. One who maintains that Christ was the Son of God by adoption only.

ADOPT'IVE, a. [L. adoptivus.] That adopts, as an adoptive father; or that is adopted, as an adoptive son.

ADÖRABLY, adv. In a manner worthy of adoration.

ADORA'TION, n. The act of paying honours to a divine being; the worship paid to God; the act of addressing as a God. Adoration consists in external homage, accompanied with the highest reverence. It is used for the act of praying, or preferring requests, or thanksgiving to the Supreme Being.—2. Homage paid to one in high esteem, profound reverence.

Adoration, among the Jews, was performed by bowing, kneeling, and prostration. Among the Romans, the devotee, with his head uncovered, applied his right hand to his lips, bowing and turning himself from left to right. The Persians fell on the face, striking the forehead against the earth, and kissing the ground. The adoration paid to the Grecian and Roman emperors, consisted in bowing and kneeling at the feet of the prince, laying hold of his robe, then withdrawing the hand and clapping it to the lips. In modern times, adoration is paid to the pope by kissing his feet, and to princes, by kneeling and kissing the hand. This word was used by the Romans for acclamation or great applause, given to public performers; and the election of a pope is sometimes by adoration, that is, by sudden acclamation without scrutiny.

ADŌRE, v. t. [L. adoro. In Ch. and Heb. הדר, hadar, to honour, reverence, or glorify, to adorn; Heb. אדר, hadar, to be magnificent or glorious, to magnify, to glorify. This word is usually referred to the Latin ad orare, to carry to one's mouth; ad and os, oris; as, in order to kiss one's hand, the hand is carried to one's mouth. See CALMET, ad verbum, who cites, in confirmation of this opinion, the ancient practice of kissing the hand; See Job xxxi; 1 Kings xix.; Ps. ii.; Gen. xli. Ainsworth supposes the word to be a compound of ad and oro, to pray; and if the word is compound, as I suspect, this opinion is most probably correct.] 1. To worship with profound reverence; to address with exalted thoughts, by prayer and thanksgiving; to pay divine honours to; to honour as a god or as divine.—2. To love in the highest degree; to regard with the utmost esteem, affection, and respect; as, the people adore their prince.

ADUL'TERY, n. [L. adulterium. See ADULTERATE.] 1. Violation of the marriage bed; a crime, or a civil injury, which introduces, or may introduce, into a family, a spurious offspring.

In common usage, adultery means the unfaithfulness of any married person to the marriage bed. Mankind in almost all ages, and in all civilized countries, have regarded the violation of the marriage bed with abhorrence. It has been punished in various ways, and with different degrees of severity, according to the general manners and morals of the country. When committed between two married persons, it is, according to the English law, termed double adultery; and when only one of the parties is married it is termed single adultery. Among European nations, adultery is reckoned a private offence, none but the husband being suffered to intermeddle in the affair; and what is no less remarkable, though the husband be guilty of adultery, the wife, except in Scotland, is not allowed to prosecute him for the same. In England, adultery is accounted a spiritual offence, and therefore the injured party can have no other redress but to bring an action of damages against the adulterer; and to divorce, and strip the adulteress of her dower, is all the punishment which the law inflicts on her. Parliament grants absolute divorces for infidelity to the marriage bed in either party; and the spiritual courts divorce a mensa et thoro.

2. In a scriptural sense, all manner of lewdness or unchastity, as in the seventh commandment.—3. In scripture, idolatry, or apostasy from the true God; Jer. iii.—4. AD'VOCATE, n. [L. advocatus, from advoco, to call for, to plead for; of ad and voco, to call. See VOCAL.] 1. Advocate, in its primary sense, signifies, one who pleads the cause of another in a court of civil law Hence,—2. One who pleads the cause of another before any tribunal or judicial court, as a barrister in the English courts. We say, A man is a learned lawyer and an able advocate.

In Europe, advocates have different titles, according to their particular duties.

Consistorial advocates, in Rome, appear before the Consistory, in opposition to the disposal of benefices.

Elective advocates are chosen by a bishop, abbot, or chapter, with license from the prince.

Feudal advocates were of a military kind, and to attach them to the church, had grants of land, with power to lead the vassals of the church to war.

Fiscal advocates, in ancient Rome, defended causes in which the public revenue was concerned.

Juridical advocates became judges, in consequence of their attending causes in the earl's court.

Matricular advocates defended the cathedral churches.

Military advocates were employed by the church to defend it by arms, when force gave law to Europe.

Some advocates were called nominative, from their being nominated by the pope or king; some regular, from their being qualified by a proper course of study. Some were supreme; others, subordinate.

Advocate, in the German polity, is a magistrate appointed in the emperor's name to administer justice.

Faculty of advocates, in Scotland, is a society of eminent lawyers, who practise in the highest courts, and who are admitted members only upon the severest examination, at three different times. It consists of about two hundred members, and from this body are vacancies on the bench usually supplied.

Lord advocate, in Scotland, the principal crown lawyer, or prosecutor of crimes.

Judge advocate, in courts martial, a person who manages the prosecution.

In English and American courts, advocates are the same as counsel, or counsellors. In England, they are of two degrees, barristers and serjeants; the former, being apprentices or learners, cannot, by ancient custom, be admitted serjeants, till of sixteen years' standing. —3. One who defends, vindicates, or espouses a cause, by argument; one who is friendly to; as, an advocate for peace, or for the oppressed.

In Scripture, Christ is called an advocate for his people.

We have an advocate with the Father; 1 John ii.

Advocates' library. A library founded in 1660, by the faculty of advocates in Edinburgh. It is by far the largest and most valuable library in Scotland, containing about 150,000 volumes. Besides law books, there are works on all subjects, many original manuscripts, and a great variety of coins and medals.

AD'VOCATE, v. t. To plead in favour of; to defend by argument, before a tribunal; to support or vindicate.

The Duke of York advocated the amendment. Debates on the Regency in the House of Lords, Dec. 27, 1810.

The idea of a legislature, consisting of a single branch, though advocated by some, was generally reprobated. Ramsay, Hist. Carolina.

How little claim persons who advocate this sentiment, really possess to be considered Calvinists, will appear from the following quotation. Mackenzie's Life of Calvin.

The most eminent orators were engaged to advocate his cause. Mitford.

AD'VOCATED, pp. Defended by argument; vindicated.

ADVOW'SON, n. (s as z.) [Fr. avouerie, from avouer, to avow; Norm. avoerie, or avoeson. But the word was latinized, advocatio, from advoco, and avow is from advoco.] In English law, a right of presentation to a vacant benefice; or, in other words, a right of nominating a person to officiate in a vacant church. The name is derived from advocatio, because the right was first obtained by such as were founders, benefactors, or strenuous defenders, advocates, of the church. Those who have this right are styled patrons. Advowsons are of three kinds, presentative, collative, and donative; presentative, when the patron presents his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted; collative, when the bishop is the patron, and institutes, or collates his clerk, by a single act; donative, when a church is founded by the king, and assigned to the patron, without being subject to the ordinary, so that the patron confers the benefice on his clerk, without presentation, institution, or induction.

Advowsons are also appendant, that is, annexed to a manor; or, in gross, that is, annexed to the person of the patron.

From this place the oracles were given, and none but the priests were permitted to enter into it. The Jewish sanctum sanctorum was a similar part of the temple of Jerusalem.

ADZE, n. [Sax. adese; Sp. azuela; formerly written in Eng. addice.] A cutting instrument used for chopping a horizontal surface of timber. It consists of a blade of iron forming a portion of a cylindrical surface, ground to an edge from the concave side outwards at one end, and having a socket at the other end for the handle, which is set radially.

Æ, a diphthong in the Latin language; used also by the Saxon writers. It answers to the Gr. αι. The Sax. æ has been changed into e or ea. In derivatives from the learned languages, it is mostly superseded by e, and convenience seems to require it to be wholly rejected in anglicized words. For such words as may be found with this initial combination, the reader will therefore search under the letter E.

ÆCID'IUM, n. In bot., a genus of minute parasitic plants, belonging to the natural order fungi, found in great abundance in this and other northern countries. The species are universally parasitic upon the leaves, or flowers, or bark, of living plants.

A'EROLITE, n. [Gr. αηρ, air, and λιθος, a stone.] A stone falling from the air, or atmospheric regions; a meteoric stone. Nothing is positively known as to the origin of aërolites; by some authors they have been supposed to come from the moon, being projected by volcanic force, beyond the sphere of the moon's attraction; by others they have been thought to be children of the air, created by the union of simpler forms of matter. They do not resemble any other substance found on the earth, and it has been indisputably proved that they are not of terrestrial formation. The fall of these bodies has been well ascertained, and has occurred at different times and in various parts through many ages. Some of them are large, weighing 300 pounds. They are all found to agree in their constituent parts; they are covered with a thin crust of a deep black colour, their exterior is roughened with small projections, and they are destitute of gloss. Internally their texture is granulated, and of a grayish colour; they appear composed of a number of small spherical bodies, and metallic grains imbedded in a softer matter. When analyzed, they are found to consist of silica, magnesia, iron, nickel, and chrome; lime, alumine, and manganese, have also been found in them.

AEROLOG'ICAL, a. Pertaining to aerology.

AEROL'OGIST, n. One who is versed in aerology.

Many are the afflictions of the righteous; Ps. xxxiv.

AFFLICT'IVE, a. Giving pain; causing continued or repeated pain or grief; painful; distressing.

AFFLICT'IVELY, adv. In a manner to give pain or grief.

AF'FLUENCE, n. [L. affluentia, of ad and fluo, to flow. See FLOW.] 1. Literally, a flowing to, or concourse. In this sense it is rarely used. It is sometimes written affluency.—2. Figuratively, abundance of riches; great plenty of worldly goods; wealth.

AF'FLUENT, a. Flowing to; more generally, wealthy; abounding in goods or riches; abundant.

AF'FLUENTLY, adv. In abundance; abundantly.

AF'FLUX, n. [L. affluxum, from affluo. See FLOW.] The act of flowing to; a flowing to, or that which flows to; as, an afflux of blood to the head.

AFFLUX'ION, n. The act of flowing to; that which flows to. [See AFFLUX.]

AF'FORAGE, n. [Fr. afforer, to value. See AFFEER.] In France, a duty paid to the lord of a district, for permission to sell wine or other liquors, within his seignory.

AFFÖRCE'MENT,† n. [ad and force.] In old charters, a fortress; a fortification for defence.

AFFÖRD, v. t. [ad and the root of forth, further; G. födern, to further or promote. The sense is to send forth. But I have not found this precise word in the exact sense of the English, in any other language.] 1. To yield or produce as fruit, profit, issues, or result. Thus, the earth affords grain; a well affords water; trade affords profit; distilled liquors afford spirit. 2. To yield, grant, or confer; as, a good life affords consolation in old age.—3. To be able to grant or sell with profit or without loss; as, A can afford wine at a less price than B.—4. To be able to expend without injury to one's estate; as, a man can afford a sum yearly in charity; or be able to bear expenses, or the price of the thing purchased; as, one man can afford to buy a farm, which another cannot.—5. To be able without loss or with profit.

The merchant can afford to trade for smaller profits. Hamilton.

AFFÖRDED, pp. Yielded as fruit, produce or result; sold without loss or with profit.

AFFÖRDING, ppr. Yielding; producing; selling without loss; bearing expenses.

AFFOR'EST, v. t. [ad and forest.] To convert ground into forest, as was done by the first Norman kings in England, for the purpose of affording them the pleasures of the chase.

AFFORESTA'TION, n. The act of turning ground into forest or wood land.

AFFOR'ESTED, pp. Converted into forest.

AFFOR'ESTING, ppr. Converting into forest.

AFFRAN'CHISE, v. t. To make free.

AFFRAN'CHISED, pp. Made free.

AFFRAN'CHISEMENT, n. [See FRANCHISE and DISFRANCHISE.] The act of making free, or liberating from dependence or servitude. [Lit. us.]

AFFRAN'CHISING, ppr. Making free.

AFFRAP',† v. t. [Fr. frapper, to strike; Eng. rap.] To strike.

AFFRĀY, AFFRĀY'MENT, n. [Fr. effrayer, to frighten; effroi, terror; Arm. effreyza, effrey.] 1. In law, the fighting of two or more persons, in a public place, to the terror of others. Formerly, it signified the crime of affrighting other persons by appearing in unusual armour, brandishing a weapon, &c. A fighting in private is not in a legal sense an affray, but an assault.—2. In popular lan., fray is used to express any fighting of two or more persons; but the word is now deemed inelegant.—3. Tumult; disturbance.

AFFREIGHT', v. t. (affra'te.) [See FREIGHT.] To hire a ship for the transportation of goods or freight.

AFFREIGHT'ED, pp. Hired for transporting goods.

AFFRŎNT', v. t. [Fr. affronter, to encounter face to face, of ad and L. frons, front, face.] 1.† Literally, to meet or encounter face to face, in a good or bad sense; as,

The seditious affronted the king's forces. Hayward. Milton. Shak.

2. To offer abuse to the face; to insult, dare or brave openly; to offer abuse or insult in any manner, by words or actions; as, to affront one by giving him the lie.—3. To abuse, or give cause of offence to, without being present with the person; to make slightly angry; a popular use of the word.

AFFRŎNT', n. Opposition to the face; open defiance; encounter.†—2. Ill treatment; abuse; any thing reproachful or contemptuous, that excites or justifies resentment, as foul language, or personal abuse. It usually expresses a less degree of abuse than insult.—3. Shame; disgrace. [Not usual.]—4. In popular lan., slight resentment; displeasure.

AFFRONTÉ', a. In her., front to front; an epithet given to animals that face each other; on an escutcheon, a kind of bearing which is otherwise called confronté, and stands opposed to adossé; also an epithet for a savage's head, that on a charge is full-faced.

Affronté.

AFFRŎNT'ED, pp. Opposed face to face; dared; defied; abused.—2. In popular lan., offended; slightly angry at ill treatment, by words or actions; displeased.

AFFRŎNT'ER, n. One that affronts.

AFFRŎNT'ING, ppr. Opposing face to face; defying; abusing; offering abuse, or any cause of displeasure.

AFFRŎNT'ING, a. Contumelious; abusive.

AFLŌAT, adv. or a. [a and float.] 1. Borne on the water; floating; swimming; as, the ship is afloat.—2. Figuratively, moving; passing from place to place; as, a rumour is afloat.—3. Unfixed; moving without guide or control; as, our affairs are all afloat. [As an adjective, this word always follows the noun.]

AFOOT', adv. [a or on and foot.] On foot; borne by the feet; opposed to riding.—2. In action; in a state of being planned for execution; as, a design is afoot, or on foot.

AFŌRE, adv. or prep. [a and fore.] In front.—2. Between one object and another, so as to intercept a direct view or intercourse; as, to stand between a person and the light of a candle—a popular use of the word. 3. Prior in time; before; anterior; prior time being considered as in front of subsequent time.

The grass which withereth afore it groweth up; Ps. cxxix.

In all these senses it is now inelegant, and superseded by before.—4. In seaman's lan., toward the head of the ship; further forward, or nearer the stem; as, afore the windlass. Afore the mast, is a phrase which is applied to a common sailor, one who does duty on the main deck, or has no office on board the ship.

AFŌREGOING, a. Going before. [See FOREGOING, which is chiefly used.]

AFŌREHAND, adv. [afore and hand.] 1. In time, previous; by previous provision; as, he is ready aforehand.

She is come aforehand to anoint my body; Mark xiv.

2. a. Prepared; previously provided; as, to be aforehand in business. Hence in popular lan., amply provided; well supplied with the means of living; having means beyond the requirements of necessity; moderately wealthy. This word is popularly changed into aforehanded, beforehanded, or rather forehanded; as, a forehanded farmer.

AFŌREMENTIONED, a. [afore and mentioned.] Mentioned before in the same writing or discourse.

AFŌRENĀMED, a. [afore and name.] Named before.

AFŌRESAID, a. [afore and say.] Said or recited before, or in a preceding part.

AFŌRETHOUGHT, a. [afore and thought.] Premeditated, prepense; as, malice aforethought, which is required to constitute murder; a law term.

AFŌRETIME, adv. [afore and time.] In time past; in a former time.

A fortiori, [L.] For a stronger reason. Among log., a term employed in a chain of reasoning, to imply that what follows is a more powerful argument than what has been already adduced. It is also used by mathematicians in the same signification.

AFOUL', adv. or a. [a and foul.] Not free; entangled.

AFRĀID, a. [Pp. of the obs. verb affray.] Impressed with fear or apprehension; fearful. This word expresses a less degree of fear than terrified or frightened. It is followed by of before the object of fear; as, to be afraid of death; Joseph was afraid to sin against God.

AFRESH', adv. [a and fresh.] Anew; again; recently; after intermission.

They crucify the son of God afresh; Heb. vi.

AFRŎNT', adv. In front.

ĂFT, a. or adv. [Sax. æft, eft, after, behind.] In seamen's lan., a word used to denote the stern or what pertains to the stern of a ship; as, the aft part of the ship; haul aft the main sheet, that is, further towards the stern. Fore and aft is the whole length of a ship. Right aft is in a direct line with the stern.

ĂFTER, a. [The comparative degree of aft. But in some Teutonic dialects it is written with g; D. agter; Dan. agters. The Eng. corresponds with the Sax. æfter, Sw. efter, Goth. aftaro, Dan. efter.] 1. In marine lan., more aft, or towards the stern of the ship; as, the after sails; after hatchway.—2. In common lan., later in time; as, an after period of life. In this sense, the word is often combined with the following noun; as, in afternoon.

ĂFTER, prep. Behind in place; as, men placed in a line one after another. 2. Later in time; as, after supper. This word often precedes a sentence, as a governing preposition.

After I have arisen, I will go before you into Galilee; Mat. xxvi.

3. In pursuit of, that is, moving behind, following; in search of.

After whom is the king of Israel come out; 1 Sam. xxiv.

Ye shall not go after other gods; Deut. vi.

4. In imitation of; as, to make a thing after a model.—5. According to; as, consider a thing after its intrinsic value.—6. According to the direction and influence of.

To walk after the flesh; to live after the flesh; Rom. viii.

To inquire after, is to seek by asking; to ask concerning. To follow after, in Scripture, is to pursue, or imitate; to serve, or worship.

ĂFTER, adv. Posterior; later in time; as, it was about the space of three hours after. In this sense the word, however, is really a preposition, the object being understood; about three hours after the time or fact before specified. After is prefixed to many words, forming compounds, but retaining its genuine signification. Some of the following words are of this kind, but in some of them after seems rather to be a separate word.

The title is given to various chief officers, whether civil or military. It is also given to great landholders, and to the eunuchs of the Sultan's seraglio.

AGĀIN, adv. (agen'.) [Sax. geun, agen, agean, ongean; D. with a different prefix, tegen; qu. L. con, whence contra; Ir. coinne, opposite, a meeting. Hence Sax. togeanes, togegnes, against; but placed after its object; as, "hi comen heom togeanes," they come them against. The primary sense is to turn, or to meet in front; or the name of the face, front, or forepart. So in Dan. and Sw. mod, imod, emot, against, is our word meet.] 1. A second time; once more.

I will not again curse the ground; Gen. viii.

2. It notes something further, or additional to one or more particulars.

For to which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee? and again, I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son? and again, Let all the angels of God worship him; Heb. i.

All the uses of this word carry in them the ideas of return or repetition; as in these phrases,—give it back again; give him as much again, that is, the same quantity once more or repeated. We shall never again behold such a magnificent display of beauty and fashion. Who art thou that answerest again? Bring us word again.

Again and again, often; with frequent repetition.

AGĀINST, prep. (agenst'). [Sax. togeanes. See Again.] 1. In opposition; noting enmity or disapprobation.

His hand will be against every man; Gen. xvi.

I am against your pillows; Ez. xiii.

2. In opposition, noting contrariety, contradiction, or repugnance; as a decree against law, reason, or public opinion.—3. In an opposite direction; as, to ride against the wind.—5. Opposite in place; abreast; as, a ship is against the mouth of a river. In this sense it is often preceded by over.

Aaron lighted the lamps over against the candlesticks; Num. viii.

6. In opposition, noting adversity, injury, or contrariety to wishes; as, this change of measures is against us.—7. Bearing upon; as, one leans against a wall.—8. In provision for; in preparation for.

Urijah made it, against King Ahaz came from Damascus; 2 Kings xvi.

In this sense against is a preposition, with the following part of the sentence for an object. See AFTER, prep. def. 2. In short, the sense of this word is opposition, variously modified according to its application to different objects.

AG'ALAXY, n. Destitution of milk.

AG'ALLOCH, AGAL'LOCHUM, n. [Gr. from αγαλλιασμαι, to rejoice, so named from its odour.] Aloes-wood, the product of a tree growing in China and some of the Indian isles. There are three varieties, the calambac, the common lignum aloes, and the calambour. The first variety is light and porous, and so filled with a fragrant resin, that it may be moulded by the fingers; the second is denser and less resinous; and the third is the aloes-wood used by cabinet makers and inlayers.

AGALMAT'OLITE, n. [Gr. αγαλμα, image, and λιθος, stone.] A name given by Klaproth to two varieties of the pierre de lard, lard-stone of China. It contains no magnesia, but otherwise has the characters of talc. It is called in German, bildstein, figure-stone, and by Brongniart, steatite pagodite.

AG'AMA, n. In zool., a genus of reptiles belonging to the order of saurians, and family iguanians, as established by Cuvier in his Animal Kingdom.

AG'AMÆ, n. In bot., a name given by some authors to the large division of the vegetable kingdom called flowerless, and may be considered equivalent to the older term cryptogamic plants.

AG'AMI, n. The trophia crepitans of Latham, an interesting bird, sometimes also termed the gold-breasted trumpeter. It is of the size of a pheasant or large fowl, has a short tail, and long legs, and runs with great speed.

AG'AMIST, n. [Gr. α and γαμος.] One who does not marry; one who refuses or rejects marriage.

AG'AMOUS, a. [Gr. α neg. and γαμος, marriage.] In bot., a term applied to such groups of plants as confervæ, lichens, and fungi, because they have nothing either analogous or similar to the sexes of more perfect plants. It is substituted by some writers for cryptogamic.

AGAPE, adv. or a. [a and gape. See GAPE.] Gaping, as with wonder, expectation, or eager attention; having the mouth wide open.

AG'APE, n. (ag'apy) [Gr. αγαπη, love.] Among the primitive Christians, a love feast or feast of charity, held before or after the communion, when contributions were made for the poor. This feast was held at first without scandal, but afterward being abused, it was condemned at the council of Carthage, A. D. 397.

AG'ARIC, n. [Gr. αγαρικον, Qu. from Agaria, in Sarmatia. Dioscorides.] In bot., a genus of funguses, containing numerous species, growing on trees, or springing from the earth; of the latter sort, some are valued as articles of food; others are poisonous. The name was originally given to a fungus growing on the larch. This species is now frequent in the shops, and distinguished by the name of female agaric. It is used in dyeing, but is little esteemed in medicine. The common mushroom is a species of agaric (a. campestris.) The Agaric of the oak is called touch-wood, from its readiness to take fire. Boletus igniarius, Linn.

Agaric mineral, a calcareous earth, or carbonate of lime, resembling a fungus in colour and texture; found in fissures of rocks, and on the roofs of caverns. It is sometimes used as an astringent in fluxes, and a styptic in hemorrhages. It occurs in a loose semi-indurated form, white or whitish red, or yellow, light and friable. Kirwan mentions three varieties.

AGAST', or AGHAST', a. [Qu. a contraction of agazed, or Goth. agis, Sax. egesa, horror. See AGHAST and GAZE.] Struck with terror, or astonishment; amazed; struck silent with horror.

With shuddering horror pale and eyes agast. Milton.

AGATE,† adv. [a and gate.] On the way; going.

AG'ATE, n. [Fr. agate; L. achates, gagates; Gr. γαγατης; so called, says Pliny, 37, 10, because found near a river of that name in Sicily. So also Solinus and Isidore. But Bochart, with more probability, deduces it from the Punic and Heb. עקד, okad, and with a different prefix Heb. נקד, nakad, spotted. The word is used, Gen. xxx. and xxxi., to describe the speckled and spotted cattle of Laban and Jacob.] A class of silicious, semi-pellucid gems of many varieties, consisting of quartz-crystal, flint, horn-stone, chalcedony, amethyst, jasper, cornelian, heliotrope, and jade, in various combinations, variegated with dots, zones, filaments, ramifications, arborizations, and various figures. Agates seem to have been formed by successive layers of silicious earth, on the sides of cavities which they now fill entirely or in part. They are esteemed the least valuable of the precious stones. Even in Pliny's time, they were in little estimation. They are found in rocks, in the form of fragments, in nodules, in small rounded lumps, rarely in stalactites. Their colours are various. They are used for rings, seals, cups, beads, boxes, and handles of small utensils.

AG'ATE, n. An instrument used by gold-wire drawers, so called from the agate in the middle of it.

AG'ATINE, a. Pertaining to agate.

AG'ATINE, n. A genus of shells, oval or oblong.

AGAZE,† v. t. [from gaze.] To strike with amazement.

AGAZED,† pp. Struck with amazement.

AGE, n. [Fr. age; deduced by Lunier from Lat. ætas, or ævum. But these are undoubtedly contracted words, Goth. aiw; Gr. αιων: from the Celtic, W. haug, fullness, completeness, an age, a space of time; plu. hogion; the g being sunk in the Latin words; in the Sanscrit, yuga.] 1. The whole duration of a being, whether animal, vegetable, or other kind; as, the usual age of a man is seventy years; the age of a horse may be twenty or thirty years; the age of a tree may be four hundred years.—2. That part of the duration of a being, which is between its beginning and any given time; as, what is the present age of a man, or of the earth?

Jesus began to be about thirty years of age; Luke iii.

3. The latter part of life, or long continued duration; oldness.

The eyes of Israel were dim for age, Gen. xlviii.

4. A certain period of human life, marked by a difference of state; as, life is divided into four stages or ages, infancy, youth, manhood, and old age; the age of youth; the age of manhood. —5. The period when a person is enabled by law to do certain acts for himself, or when he ceases to be controlled by parents or guardians; as, in our country, both males and females are of age at twenty-one years old.—6. Mature years; ripeness of strength or discretion.

He is of age, ask him; John ix.

7. The time of life for conceiving children, or perhaps the usual time of such an event.

Sarah was delivered of a son when she was past age; Heb. xi.

8. A particular period of time, as distinguished from others; as, the golden age, the age of iron, the age of heroes or of chivalry.—9. The people who live at a particular period; hence, a generation and a succession of generations; as, ages yet unborn.

The mystery hid from ages; Col. i.

The quality of moving or of exerting power; the state of being in action; action; operation; instrumentality; as, the agency of providence in the natural world.—2. The office of an agent, or factor; business of an agent intrusted with the concerns of another; as, the principal pays the charges of agency.

AGEND'A, n. [L. things to be done.]

A memorandum-book; the service or office of a church; a ritual or liturgy. Among divines it is sometimes used to signify things which a man is bound to perform, in opposition to Credenda, or things which he is bound to believe.

AGENE'SIA, n. (α and γινομαι.) Among physicians, denotes impotence, sterility.

A'GENT, a. Acting; opposed to patient, or sustaining action; as, the body agent. [Lit. us.]

A'GENT, n. An actor; one that exerts power, or has the power to act; as, a moral agent.—2. An active power or cause; that which has the power to produce an effect; as, heat is a powerful agent.—3. A substitute, deputy, or factor; one intrusted with the business of another; an attorney; a minister.

Agent, in phys. science, is that by which a thing is done or effected; or any thing which has power to act on another. In chem., substances which occasion the decomposition of others, or produce a chemical change on other bodies, are called agents.

Agent in medical law, is usually applied to those causes only which have some particular activity. A voluntary or free agent, is one that may do or not do any action, and has the conscious perception, that his actions are caused by his own will. A free agent, is thus distinguished from a natural or physical agent, which is utterly destitute of any inherent voluntary principle of action, as wind, water, steam, gunpowder, springs, &c.

Agent and patient in law, is when a person is both the doer of a thing, and the party to whom it is done. Agent in Scotch law, is used to signify a solicitor before the court of session. The first clerks of advocates are entitled ex officio to act as agents in the court of session.

A'GENTSHIP,† n. The office of an agent. We now use agency.

AGRA'RIAN, a. [L. agrarius, from ager, a field.] Relating to lands. Appropriately, denoting or pertaining to an equal division of lands; as, the agrarian laws of Rome, which distributed the conquered and other public lands equally among all the citizens, limiting the quantity which each might enjoy. Authors sometimes use the word as a noun; an agrarian, for agrarian law. An agrarian distribution of land or property, would make the rich, poor; but would not make the poor, rich.

AGRA'RIANISM, n. An equal division of lands or property, or the principles of those who favour such a division.

AGREE', v. i. [Fr. agréer, from gré, will, accord. This is contracted from Sp. agradar, Port. id. to please, to gratify, whence agradable, agreeable; from the root of L. gratia, W. rhad, grace, favour, that comes freely. The primary sense is advancing, from the same root as L. gradior; W. rhaz, [rhath]; Syr. radah, to go.] 1. To be of one mind; to harmonize in opinion; as, in the expediency of the law, all the parties agree.—2. To live in concord, or without contention; as, parents and children agree well together.—3. To yield assent; to approve or admit; followed by to; as, to agree to an offer, or to an opinion.—4. To settle by stipulation, the minds of parties being agreed as to the terms; as, to agree on articles of partnership.

Didst thou not agree with me for a penny a day? Mat. xx.

5. To come to a compromise of differences; to be reconciled.

Agree with thine adversary quickly; Mat. v.

6. To come to one opinion or mind; to concur; as, to agree on a place of meeting. This sense differs not essentially from the fourth, and it often implies a resolving to do an act; John ix.—7. To be consistent; to harmonize; not to contradict, or be repugnant; as, this story agrees with what has been related by others.

Their witness agreed not together; Mark xiv.

8. To resemble: to be similar; as, the picture does not agree with the original.—9. To suit; to be accommodated or adapted to; as, the same food does not agree with every constitution.

AGREE', v. t. To admit, or come to one mind concerning; as, to agree the fact. Also, to reconcile or make friends; to put an end to variance; but these senses are unusual and hardly legitimate. Let the parties agree the fact, is really elliptical; Let them agree on the fact.

AGREEABIL'ITY,† n. Easiness of disposition.

AGREE'ABLE, a. Suitable; conformable; correspondent; consistent with; as, the practice of virtue is agreeable to the law of God and our own nature.—2. In pursuance of; in conformity with; as, agreeable to the order of the day, the House took up the report of the committee. It is not correctly followed by with. In this sense, some writers use agreeably for agreeable, but in violation of the true principles of construction; for the word is an adjective or attribute, in agreement with the last clause of the sentence. The House took up the report of the committee, (which taking up was) agreeable to the order of the day. The use of agreeably in this sentence would pervert the sense.—3. Pleasing, either to the mind or senses; as, agreeable manners; fruit agreeable to the taste.

AGREE'ABLENESS, n. Suitableness; conformity; consistency; as, the agreeableness of virtue to the laws of God.—2. The quality of pleasing; that quality which gives satisfaction or moderate pleasure to the mind or senses; as, an agreeableness of manners; there is an agreeableness in the taste of certain fruits. This is the usual sense of the word.—3.† Resemblance; likeness; with to or between.

The agreeableness between man and other parts of creation. Grew.

AGREE'ABLY, adv. Pleasingly; in an agreeable manner; in a manner to give pleasure; as, to be agreeably entertained with a discourse.—2. Suitably; consistently; conformably.

The effect of which is, that marriages grow less frequent, agreeably to the maxim above laid down. Paley.

This is a gross error, proceeding from mistake. Agreeably signifies, in an agreeable manner; but this is not the sense, nor does the word modify the verb grow. The sense is, Marriages grow less frequent, which (fact, or whole member of the sentence, or proposition) is agreeable to the maxim above laid down. This use of agreeably is common, but very erroneous.—3.† Alike; in the same manner.

Both armed agreeably. Spenser.

AGREED, pp. Being in concord or harmony of opinion; of one mind.

Can two walk together except they be agreed? Amos iii.

2. Assented to; admitted; as, a proposition is agreed to.—3. Settled by consent; implying bargain or contract; as, the terms were agreed to, or agreed upon.

AGREE'ING, ppr. Living in concord; concurring; assenting; settling by consent.

AGREE'INGLY, adv. In conformity to. [Lit. us.]

AGREE'MENT, n. Concord; harmony: conformity.

What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? 2 Cor. vi.

2. Union of opinions or sentiments; as, a good agreement subsists among the members of the council.—3. Resemblance; conformity; similitude.

Expansion and duration have this farther agreement. Locke.

4. Union of minds in regard to a transfer of interest; bargain; compact; contract; stipulation; as, he made an agreement for the purchase of a house.

Make an agreement with me by a present; 2 Kings xviii.

5. An agreement, in order to secure the aid of the law in carrying it into effect, must either be contracted by a formal instrument in writing, sealed and openly acknowledged by the party who has bound himself by it, and which is technically called a deed or specialty contract; or if contracted in a less formal manner, by word or otherwise, it must appear that the parties derive from it reciprocal benefit.—6. In gram., concord, which see.

AGRES'TIC, } a. [L. agrestis; Fr.
AGRES'TICAL, } agreste; from L. ager, a field, or the same root.]—Rural; rustic; pertaining to fields or the country, in opposition to the city; unpolished.

AGRICOLA'TION, n. Cultivation of soil.

AG'RICULTOR, n. [L. ager, a field and cultor, a cultivator.] One whose occupation is to till the ground; a farmer; a husbandman; one skilled in husbandry.

AGRICUL'TURAL, a. Pertaining to husbandry, tillage, or the culture of the earth.

AG'RICULTURE, n. [L. ager, a field, and cultura, cultivation. See ACRE and CULTURE.] In a general sense, the cultivation of the ground, for the purpose of producing vegetables, and fruits for the use of man and beast; or the art of preparing the soil, sowing and planting seeds, dressing the plants, and removing the crops. In this sense, the word includes gardening, or horticulture, and also the raising and feeding of cattle or stock. But in a more common and appropriate sense, it is used to signify that species of cultivation which is intended to raise grain and other crops for man and beast. It is equivalent to husbandry.

Agriculture is the most general occupation of man. Agriculture has been divided into theoretical and practical. Theoretical agriculture comprehends the nature and properties of soils, the different sorts of plants and seeds fitted for them, and the rotation of crops. For the proper understanding of this branch, a knowledge of chemistry is indispensably necessary. Practical agriculture, or husbandry, comprehends all the labours of the field, and of the farm yard; such as preparing the land for the reception of the seed or plants, committing the seed to the earth, rearing the crop, gathering in the fruits, cultivation and economy of animal and vegetable productions, &c.

AGRICUL'TURISM, n. The art or science of agriculture. [Lit. us.]

AGRICUL'TURIST, n. One skilled in the art of cultivating the ground; a skilful husbandman.

AG'RIMONY, n. [L. argemonia, from the Gr. Thus it is written by Pliny. But in lower Latin it is written agrimonia. Said to be from Gr. ἀργεμα, the web or pearl of the eye, from ἀργος, white, which this plant was supposed to cure. See Theoph. 887.] A genus of plants, of the class dodecandria, and order digynia, and natural order rosaceæ. Of the different species, the eupatoria, or common agrimony is the most useful. Its leaves are astringent and aromatic, and have been found useful in the preparation of fever drinks, and for the cure of slight inflammation in the mouth or throat.

AGRIPPIN'IANS, n. In Church hist., the followers of Agrippinus, bishop of Carthage in the third century, who first taught and defended the doctrine of rebaptization.

AGRĪSE,† v. i. [Sax. agrisan.] To shiver.

AGRȲSE,† v. t. To terrify; also, to make frightful.

A'GROM, n. A disease frequent in Bengal and other parts of the East Indies, in which the tongue chaps and cleaves, becomes rough and sometimes covered with white spots. The remedy is some chalybeate liquor, or the juice of mint.

AGRON'OMY, n. [ἀγρος, a field, and νομος, a rule.] The art of cultivating the ground; sometimes used, particularly by the French, as synonymous with agriculture.

AGROSTEM'MA, n. A genus of plants of several species, containing the common corn cockle, wild lychnis or campion, &c.

AGROS'TIS, n. [Gr. ἀγρωστις.] Bent-grass; a genus of grasses, consisting of many species, with loose-branched capillary panicles of flowers and a creeping habit.

AGROSTO'GRAPHY, n. A description of grasses belonging to the genus agrostis.

AGROSTOL'OGY, n. [ἀγρωστις, a grass, and λογος, speech.] That part of botany which comprehends what relates to the grasses.

AGROUND', adv. [Of a, at, or on, and ground.] 1. On the ground; a marine term, signifying that the bottom of a ship rests on the ground for want of sufficient depth of water. When the ground is near the shore, the ship is said to be ashore or stranded.—2. Figuratively, stopped; impeded by insuperable obstacles.

AGRYP'NIA, n. [ἀγρυπνια.] Among physicians, watchfulness; sleeplessness.

AGUAPECA'CA, n. The Jacana, a Brazilian bird about the size of a pigeon. In the extremity of each wing it has a sharp prickle which is used for defence.

A'GUE, n. (a'gu.) [Sax. ege, oga, or hoga, fear, horror; Arm. hegea, to shake; Goth. agis, fear, agyan or ogan, to fear; Ir. agh, fear, agha or aghaim, to fear. The radical idea is a shaking or shivering similar to that occasioned by terror.] 1. The cold fit which precedes a fever, or a paroxysm of fever in intermittents. It is accompanied with shivering.—2. Chilliness; a chill, or state of shaking with cold though in health.—3. It is used for a periodical fever, an intermittent, whether quotidian, tertian, or quartan. In this case, the word which signifies the preceding cold fit, is used for the disease.

A'GUE, v. t. To cause a shivering in; to strike with a cold fit.

A'GUE-CAKE, n. The tumour caused from a hardening of the spleen, and is often the consequence of intermittent fever or ague.

A'GUED, a. Chilly; having a fit of ague; shivering with cold or fear.

A'GUE-FIT, n. A paroxysm of cold, or shivering; chilliness.

A'GUE-PROOF, n. Able to resist ague; proof against agues

AGUER'RY,† v. t. [Fr. aguerrir; from guerre, war.] To inure to the hardships of war; to instruct in the art of war.

A'GUE-SPELL, n. A charm or spell to cure or prevent ague.

A'GUE-STRUCK, a. Struck with ague.

A'GUE-TREE, n. A name sometimes applied to sassafras, on account of its febrifuge qualities.

AGUISE,† v. t. [See GUISE.] To dress; to adorn

AGUISE,† n. Dress.

A'GUISH, a. Chilly; somewhat cold or shivering; also, having the qualities of an ague.

> Her aguish love now glows and burns.
> Granville.

A'GUISHNESS, n. Chilliness; the quality of being aguish.

AGUILLANEUF, n. [From a, to, gui, misletoe, and l'an neuf, the new year.] A form of rejoicing among the ancient Franks, on the first day of the year; derived from the druidical custom of cutting misletoe, which was held sacred by the druids, and on the first day of the year, consecrating it by crying, aguillaneuf, the year to the misletoe. This cry is said to be still observed in some parts of France; and the term came to signify also a begging of New Year's gifts.

A'GUL, n. A species of the Hedysarum.

AGUS'TINE, n. A name given to a supposed new earth, found in the Saxon beryl. It is now ascertained to be merely phosphate of lime.

AH, [Ger. ach.] An exclamation, expressive of surprise, pity, complaint, contempt, dislike, joy, exultation, &c., according to the manner of utterance.

ÄHÄ, An exclamation expressing triumph, contempt, or simple surprise; but the senses are distinguished by very different modes of utterance, and different modifications of features.—2. A sunk fence, not visible, without near approach.

AHAN'IGER, n. A name of the garfish.

AHEAD', adv. (ahed'.) [a and head, or at head.] 1. Further forward than another thing; in front; originally a sea term, denoting further forward than another ship, or on that point of the compass to which the ship's stern is directed, in opposition to astern.—2. Onward; forward; toward the point before the stem or head; as, move ahead.—3.† Headlong; without restraint; precipitantly; as, children suffered to run ahead.—4. To run ahead of one's reckoning, is to sail beyond the places erroneously estimated in the dead reckoning as the ship's station.

AHEIGHT',† adv. [a and height.] Aloft; on high.

AHECYAT'LI, n. A poisonous serpent of Mexico, somewhat resembling the rattle-snake, but destitute of rattles. Its poison is as fatal as that of any known species of serpent.

AHĪGH,† adv. On high.

AHŌLD,† adv. Near the wind; as, to lay a ship ahold.

AHO'VAI, n. A trivial name synonymous with Cerbera, a very poisonous species of plum.

AHOY', exclam. A sea term used in hailing.

AHRIMAN. See ARIMAN.

AHUIT'LA, n. A worm found in the lake of Mexico, four inches in length, as thick as a goose-quill; the tail, which is hard and poisonous, contains a sting.

AHUIT'ZOTE, n. An amphibious quadruped of the tropical climate of America, whose body is a foot long, its snout long and sharp, its skin of a mixed black and brown colour.

A-HULL, [Fr. from a and hull.] The situation of a ship when all her sails are furled, and her helm lashed on the lee-side on account of the violence of a storm; she then lies nearly with her side to the wind and sea, her head somewhat turned toward the direction of the wind.

A'IA, n. A Brazilian fowl of the spoon-bill kind, and resembling that bird in form and size.

AIC'U'RUS, n. A large and beautiful species of parrot, found in Brazil; its head beautifully variegated with yellow, red, and violet colours; its body green; the tips of its wings red, and its tail long and yellow.

AID, v. t. [Fr. aider, to help; It. aiutare, which seems to be contracted from L. adjuto. In Ar. aid, signifies to assist or strengthen; and ada, and adan, to help. In Welsh, ced is a benefit, and the word was used to denote the aids of feudal tenants.] To help, to assist; to come to the support or relief of; to support, to relieve, to succour, either by furnishing strength or means to effect a purpose, or to prevent or remove evil.

AID, n. Help; succour; support; assistance.—2. The person who aids or yields support; a helper; an auxiliary; also the thing that aids or yields succour.—3. In English law, a subsidy or tax granted by parliament, and making a part of the king's revenue. In France, aids were equivalent to customs or duties on imports and exports.—4. In England, a tax paid by a tenant to his lord; originally a mere gift, which afterward became a right demandable by the lord. The aids of this kind were chiefly three. 1. To ransom the lord when a prisoner. —2. To make the lord's eldest son a knight.—3. To marry the lord's eldest daughter.—5. An aid-de-camp, so called by abbreviation.—6. To pray in aid, in law, is to call a person interested in a title, to assist in defending it. Thus a tenant for life may pray in the aid of him in remainder or reversion; that is, he may pray or petition that he may be joined in the suit to aid or help maintain the title. This act or petition is called aid-prayer.—Court of aids, in France, was a court which had cognisance of causes respecting duties or customs.

ĀIDANCE, n. Aid; help; assistance. [Lit. us.]

ĀIDANT, †a. Helping; helpful; supplying aid.

AID-DE-CAMP, n. plur. Aids-de-camp. [Fr., but naturalised, and here anglicised.]
In milit. affairs, an officer whose duty is to receive and communicate the orders of a general officer. [The pronunciation should be English, according to the orthography, not aid de cang.]

ĀIDED, pp. Assisted; supported; furnished with succour.

ĀIDER. n. One who helps; an assistant, or auxiliary.

ĀIDING, ppr. Helping; assisting.

AIDLESS, a. Helpless; without aid; unsupported; undefended.

ĀIG'LET, n. In her., An eaglet or young eagle.

ĀIG'REMORE, n A name given to charcoal, when in that state of preparation for the making of gunpowder, which renders it fit for the admixture of the other constituent materials.

ĀIGRET, ĀIGRETTE, n. In zool., a name of the small white heron.—2. In bot. [See EGRET.]—3. A plume.

ĀIGUIL'LE, n. (From the French.) The name of an instrument used by military engineers for piercing a rock, for the lodgement of gunpowder, in a mine. A similar instrument is used in the common operations of mining, and the blasting of rocks.
Aiguilles in geol., the needle-like points or tops of granite rocks.

ĀIGUISCE', AIGUISSE', or EGUISCE'. In her., denotes a cross with its four ends sharpened, but so as to terminate in obtuse angles.

ĀIGULET, n. [Fr. Usually contracted into Aiglet.] A point or tag, as at the ends of fringes.

ĀIKRAW, n. A popular name of a species of lichen, or moss.

AIL, v. t. [Sax. eglian, to be troubled, to be irksome; egle, trouble, grief. In the Saxon it is impersonal.] To trouble; to affect with uneasiness, either of body or mind; used to express some uneasiness or affection, whose cause is unknown; as, what ails the man? I know not what ails him.

What aileth thee, Hagar? Gen. xxi.

It is never used to express a specific disease. We never say, he ails a pleurisy; but it is usual to say, he ails something; he ails nothing; nothing ails him.

AIL, n. Indisposition, or morbid affection.

ĀILING, ppr. Diseased; indisposed; full of complaints.

ĀILMENT, n. Disease; indisposition; morbid affection of the body; but the word is not applied ordinarily to acute diseases.

AIM, v. i. [Qu. Ir. oigham, to eye. Skinner refers this word to the old Fr. esmer. If this was the orthography, I know not its affinities.] To point at, with a missive weapon; to direct the intention or purpose; to attempt to reach, or accomplish; to tend toward; to endeavour; followed by at before the object; as, a man aims at distinction; or aims to be rich.

AIM, v. t. To direct or point as a weapon; to direct to a particular object; as, to aim a musket or an arrow, the fist or a blow; to aim a satire or a reflection at some person or vice.

AIM, n. The pointing or direction of a missile weapon; the direction of any thing to a particular point or object, with a view to strike or affect it; as a spear, a blow, a discourse or remark. —2. The point intended to be hit, or object intended to be affected; as, a man missed his aim.—3. Figuratively, a purpose; intention; design; scheme; as, men are often disappointed of their aim.—4.† Conjecture; guess.

It is impossible, by aim, to tell it. Spenser on Ireland.

AIMED, pp. Pointed; directed; intended to strike or affect.

ĀIMER, n. One that aims.

ĀIMING, ppr. Pointing a weapon at an object; directing any thing to an object; intending; purposing.

ĀIMLESS, a. Without aim.

ĀIM'LESSLY, adv. Without aim.

ĀIR, n. [Fr. air; L. aer; Gr. ἀήρ; Ir. aer; W. awyr; Ch. [illegible] aur; Ar. aiar. This word, in the Shemitic languages, falls under the root [illegible], aoor, Heb. and Ch., to shine. The radical sense is to open, expand; whence clear; or to flow, to shoot, to radiate.] 1. The fluid which we breathe. Air is inodorous, invisible, insipid, colourless, elastic, possessed of gravity, easily moved, rarefied, and condensed.
Atmospheric air is composed by volume of 20 or 21 oxygen, and 80 or 79 nitrogen; by weight, of 8 oxygen to 28 nitrogen.
Oxygen gas is called vital air. The body of air surrounding the earth is called the atmosphere. The specific gravity of air is to that of water, nearly as 1 to 828. Air is necessary to life; being inhaled into the lungs, the oxygenous part is separated from the azotic, and it is supposed to furnish the body with heat and animation. It is the medium of sounds, and necessary to combustion.—2. Air in motion; a light breeze.—3. Vent; utterance abroad; publication; publicity; as, a story has taken air.

You gave it air before me. Dryden.

Wind is used in like manner.—4. A tune; a short song or piece of music adapted to words; also, the peculiar modulation of the notes, which gives music its character; as, a soft air. A song or piece of poetry for singing; also, the leading part of a tune, or that which is intended to exhibit the greatest variety of melody.—5. The peculiar look, appearance, manner or mien of a person; as, a heavy air; the air of a youth; a graceful air; a lofty air. It is applied to manners or gestures, as well as to features.—6. Airs, in the plural, is used to denote an affected manner, show of pride, haughtiness; as, when it is said of a person, he puts on airs. The word is used also to express the artificial motions or carriage of a horse.—7. In paint., that which expresses the life of action; manner; gesture; attitude.—8. Qu.† Any thing light or uncertain; that is light as air.

Who builds his hope in air of your fair looks. Shak.

9.† Advice; intelligence; information. —10. Different states of air are characterized by different epithets; as, good air, foul air, morning air, evening air; and sometimes airs may have been used for ill-scent or vapour, but the use is not legitimate.
To take the air, is to go abroad; to walk or ride a little distance. To take air, is to be divulged; to be made public.

ĀIR, v. t. To expose to the air; to give access to the open air; to ventilate; as, to air clothes; to air a room.—2. To expose to heat; to warm; as, to air liquors.—3. To dry by a fire; to expel dampness; as, to air linen.

ĀIRA, n. Hair-grass, a genus belonging to the natural order of grasses.

ĀIR-BALLOON. See BALLOON.

ĀIR-BALLOON'IST, n. One who makes or uses air-balloons.

ĀIR-BED, n. A substitute for a common bed. It consists of a bag of the size of a bed, divided into several compartments, and rendered air-tight by a composition of which Indian rubber forms the greatest part. This bag is inflated by a bellows, a syringe, or any other means, and is furnished with stopcocks to retain the air, or let it out at pleasure. Air-pillows are constructed in the same way.

ĀIR-BLADDER, n. A vesicle or cuticle filled with air.—2. A bag situated under the backbone of certain fishes, and which, being full of air, is supposed to assist in breathing, and in giving buoyancy to the animal.

ĀIR-BORNE, a. Borne in, or by the air.

ĀIR-BRAVING, a. Braving the winds

ĀIR-BUILT, a. Erected in the air; having no solid foundation; chimerical; as an air-built castle; air-built hopes.

ĀIR-CELLS, n. In plants, are cavities

Air-Cells.

in the leaves or stems, or other parts, containing air, as exhibited in the glo bular protuberances of sea-weeds. The air-cells of aquatic plants are for the purpose of floating them to the surface of the water.

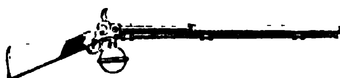
ĀIR-CONDENSER, n. An apparatus for condensing air. It consists of a close vessel with a syringe attached to it. The syringe, which is placed in an upright position, is used for injecting air into the vessel, until the requisite degree of condensation be produced.



ĀIR-DRAIN. A cavity formed round the external walls of a building to prevent the earth from lying against them and causing dampness.

ĀIR-DRAWN, a. Drawn in air; imaginary.

ĀIRED, pp. Exposed to air; cleansed by air; heated or dried by exposure to a fire; ventilated.

ĀIRER, n. One who exposes to the air.

ĀIR-GUN, n. A machine in the form of a musket, in which highly condensed air is substituted for gunpowder to expel the ball, which will be projected forward with greater or less velocity according to the degree of condensation and the weight of the body projected. A hollow spherical ball is attached to the gun, which serves as a reservoir for the condensed air. A portion of this air is allowed to escape into the barrel each time the trigger is drawn, so that it presses against the ball precisely in the same way as gunpowder.

Air-Gun.

ĀIR-FOUNTAIN, n. A contrivance for producing a jet of water by the elastic force of air compressed in a close vessel, and made to act on the surface of the water to be raised.

ĀIR-HOLDER, n. [Air and hold.] An instrument for holding air, for the purpose of counteracting the pressure of a decreasing column of mercury. A gasometer is sometimes called an Air-holder.

ĀIR-HOLE, n. An opening to admit or discharge air.

ĀIRINESS, n. Exposure to a free current of air; openness to the air: as, the airiness of a country-seat.—2. Gaiety; levity; as, the airiness of young persons.

ĀIRING, ppr. Exposing to the air; warming: drying.

ĀIRING, n. An exposure to the air, or to a fire, for warming or drying; also, a walk or ride in the open air; a short excursion. The exercise of horses in the open air.

ĀIR-JACKET, n. A leather jacket, to which are fastened bags or bladders filled with air, to render persons buoyant in swimming.

ĀIR-LAMP, n. A pneumatic machine formed by the combination of inflammable air and electricity, which by turning a stop-cock, produces a flame that may be restrained or continued at pleasure.

ĀIRLESS, a. Not open to a free current of air; wanting fresh air, or communication with open air.

ĀIRLING, n. A thoughtless, gay person.

ĀIR-MOTIVE ENGINE, n. A locomotive engine in which air is employed in place of steam, as a prime mover. The elastic force of air increases by heat, and decreases by a decrease of temperature, and various attempts have been made, by taking advantage of this property, to employ air for propelling engines on railways.

ĀIR-PIPE, n. A pipe used to draw foul air from a ship's hold, by means of a communication with the furnace, and the rarefaction of the air by fire. This pipe is intended to supply the combustion with the air of the hold, by preventing the access of other air to the fire.

ĀIR-PLANTS, n. Plants which possess the power of living for a considerable time, if suspended in air without being in contact with any substance from which they can absorb food. The Orchideæ are of this kind, and are called epiphytes, from growing upon other plants without deriving any nourishment from them.

ĀIR-POISE, n. [Air and poise.] An instrument to measure the weight of the air.

ĀIR-PRESSURE ENGINE, n. An engine in which the pressure of air of different densities is employed as a moving force.

ĀIR-PUMP, n. A most valuable pneumatic machine, for the purpose of exhausting the air from a proper vessel, and thereby producing what is called a vacuum. By means of experiments with this machine, the weight, elasticity, and many other properties of air may be shown in a very interesting and satisfactory manner. It teaches us how much all vital, generative, nutritive, and alterative powers, depend upon atmospheric air, and to it we are indebted for most of the important facts which we possess concerning the mechanical properties and effects of air. The air-pump acts by the elastic force of air, and gradually exhausts the air from a vessel called a receiver, by means of a piston, with a proper valve, working in a cylindrical barrel or tube, somewhat after the manner of a common water pump. Air-pumps are variously constructed; the most common forms have two barrels and two pistons, wrought by a toothed wheel, as that represented in the annexed cut. [See VACUUM.]

Air-Pump.

ĀIR-SACS, n. Air bags in birds, which are certain receptacles of air, or vesicles lodged in the fleshy parts, in the hollow bones and in the abdomen, which all communicate with the lungs. These are supposed to render the body specifically lighter, and to supply the place of a muscular diaphragm.

ĀIR-SHAFT, n. A passage for air into a mine, usually opened in a perpendicular direction, and meeting the adits or horizontal passages, to cause a free circulation of fresh air through the mine.

ĀIR-STIRRING, a. Putting the air in motion.

ĀIR-STOVE, n. A stove which is employed to heat a current of air directed against its surface by means of pipes, which heated air is then admitted to the apartment requiring to be heated.

ĀIR-THERMOMETERS, n. Thermometers in which air is employed as a substitute for mercury and spirit of wine. Of these there are several kinds, but the most important is Leslie's Differential Thermometer.

Air-Thermometer.

ĀIR-THREAD, n. A name given to the spider's webs, which are often seen floating in the air. These filaments are attached to the tops or ends of branches of shrubs or trees, and serve to support the spider when in quest of prey.

ĀIR-THREATENING, a. Threatening the air; lofty.

ĀIR-TIGHT, a [Air and tight.] So tight or compact as to be impermeable to air. A vessel or tube is said to be air-tight when it possesses that degree of closeness which prevents the passage of air, under the circumstances in which it is placed.

ĀIR'-TRAP, n. A contrivance for excluding the effluvia arising from drains and sinks.

ĀIR'-TRUNK, n. A contrivance, by Dr. Hales, to prevent the stagnation of putrid effluvia in jails or apartments, where many people are collected. It is merely a square open tube, passing from the ceiling to the open air above the roof, by which the heated air escapes. Dr. Keil estimates the effluvia arising from one man in twenty-four hours, at not less than thirty-nine ounces.

ĀIR-VESSEL, n. In bot., a spiral duct in plants, containing air, and supposed to be analogous to the lungs in animals. In hydraulics, a vessel in which air is condensed by pressure, for the purpose of employing the re-action of its elasticity as a moving or as a regulating power. Such vessels are employed in fire-engines and forcing pumps.

ĀIRY, a. Consisting of air; as, an airy substance.—2. Relating or belonging to air; high in air; as, an airy flight; airy region.—3. Open to a free current of air; as, an airy situation.—4. Light as air; resembling air; thin; unsubstantial; without solidity; as, airy ghosts. An airy dress is one which admits air, and is cool. 5. Without reality; having no solid foundation; vain; trifling; as, an airy scheme; airy notions.—6. Gay; sprightly; full of vivacity and levity; light of heart; lively; as, an airy girl.

ĀIRY, or A'ERY, n. [See AERY.] Among sportsmen, the nest of the hawk or eagle.

ĀIRY-FLYING, a. Flying like air.

ĀISCHYNITE, n. Prismatoidal Euruthrone ore.

AISLE, n. Pronounced Ile. [Fr. aile, a wing; L. ala.] The wing of a building, usually applied to the lateral divisions of a church which are separated from the central part, called the nave and choir, by pillars or piers. The nave is frequently, though incorrectly, termed the middle aisle, and the lateral divisions side aisles.

Aisle, Salisbury Cathedral.

AISL'ED, a. Furnished with aisles. A church which in its breadth is divided into three or five parts, is sometimes called a three or five-aisled church.

AITIOL'OGY,† n. (Gr. αἰτιολογία.) The theory which shows the causes of things.

AIZOON', n. [Sax. aizon, from L. aizoon. It seems to be composed of Gr. αἰ, always, Sax. aa, Eng. aye, and ζῶον, living.] A genus of plants, called by Miller Sempervive. The name has, by some writers, been applied to the house-leek and to the aloes.

AJĂR, adv. [From the Anglo-Sax acyrran to turn.] On jar; on the turn; neither quite open nor shut; partly opened.

AJA'VA, n. The seed of a plant brought from Malabar, said to be an excellent carminative, and very useful in the colic.

AJU'GA, n. Bugle; a species of plants belonging to the natural order Labiatæ.

AJU'RU-CATINGA, n. A species of American parrot, of a green colour, with eyes of a fiery red, encircled with white.

AJU'RU-CURAU, n. An American parrot, of a lively green colour, with a blue crown; the throat, and sides of the head, of a fine yellow.

AJU'RU-PARA, n. A small parrot of America, of a beautiful green, with the beak, legs, and circlets of the eyes white.

AJ'UTAGE, or AD'JUTAGE, n. [Fr. from ajouter, to join.] A sort of tube fitted to the mouth, or aperture of the vessel through which the water of a fountain is to be played, and by it determined into different figures.

AKE, n. } To be in continued pain.
AKE, v. i. } [See ACHE.]

AKEE', n. The fruit of Cupania Aheesia, a plant belonging to the natural order Lapindaceæ, a native of Guiana, whence it was carried by Captain Bligh, to Jamaica, in 1793. It is there much esteemed as a fruit. The leaves somewhat resemble those of the ash; the flowers are small and white; the fruit is oblong, ribbed, and compressed in the middle, of a dull orange colour, and contains several large seeds, to the end of which is attached a rich and slightly acid arillus, which is the part eaten.

Akee Fruit.

A'KER, n. [Gr. αγρος; L. ager; Sax. acer, pronounced aker; Germ. acker.] Originally an open field. But in Great Britain, the quantity of land in the aker is fixed by statute at four thousand eight hundred and forty square yards, making one hundred and sixty square rods, perches or poles; and this is the quantity of land it contains in the United States of America. [See ACRE.]

AKER-STAFF, n. In husbandry, an instrument for clearing the coulter of the plough.

AKIN', a. [a or of and kin. See KIN.] 1. Related by blood, used of persons; as, the two families are near akin.—2. Allied by nature; partaking of the same properties; as, envy and jealousy are near akin. [This adjective is used only after the noun.]

A'KING, ppr. Having continued pain; suffering distress of mind, or grief.

A'KING, n. Continued pain, or distress of mind. [See ACHING.]

AL, In Arabic, an adjective or inseparable prefix, answering to the Italian, il, and the Sp. el and la. Its use is to render nouns definite, like the English the; as, alkoran, the koran, or the book by eminence; alcove, alchymy, alembic, almanac, &c.

AL, in English, is sometimes a contraction of the Sax. æthel, noble or illustrious. More generally al, in composition, is a contraction of ald or alt, old, and it is prefixed to many names, as, Albury. Sax. eald; Germ. alt, old. Al, in the composition of Latin words, is written before l for ad, for the ease of pronunciation; as, in allevo, alludo, for ad levo, ad ludo.

AL'ABĂSTER, n. [L. from Gr. αλαβαστρον; supposed to be from α privative and λαμβανω, to take or hold, and to be so named from its smoothness, or from vessels having no handles. Qu.]
A sub-variety of carbonate of lime, found in large masses, formed by the deposition of calcareous particles in caverns of limestone rocks. These concretions have a foliated, fibrous or granular structure, and are of a pure white colour, or more generally they present shades of yellow, red, or brown, in undulating or concentric stripes, or in spots.
Among the ancients, alabaster was also the name of a vessel in which odoriferous liquors were kept; so called from the stone of which it was made. Also, the name of a measure, containing ten ounces of wine, or nine of oil.

AL'ABĂSTER, a. Made of alabaster, or resembling it.
Alabastrum dendroide, a kind of laminated alabaster, variegated with figures of shrubs and trees, found in the province of Hohenstein.

ALABĂS'TRIAN, a. Pertaining to, or like alabaster.

ALABAS'TRITE, n. A vase, box, or other vessel used by the Greeks and Romans for holding perfumes.

ALABĂS'TRUS, n. A name given to a flower bud. It was originally applied to the rose bud.

ALACK', exclam. [Per. halaka, perdition, destruction, and alaksadan, to perish.] An exclamation expressive of sorrow.

ALACK'ADAY. An exclamation uttered to express regret or sorrow.

ALAC'RIOUSNESS,† n. Briskness.

ALAC'RITY, n. [L. alacritas, from alacer, alacris.] Cheerfulness; gaiety; sprightliness; more usually, a cheerful readiness or promptitude to do some act; cheerful willingness; as, the soldiers advanced with alacrity to meet the enemy.

ALAD'INISTS. Free thinkers among the Mohammedans.

ALÆ, n. plur. [Lat. ala-æ, a wing.] Wings. In bot., the side petals of a papilionaceous blossom, or membranes added to a seed, stalk, &c Ala or alæ, is also applied in anat., to many parts; as ala auris, the upper and outer part of the external ear; alæ nasi, the lateral cartilages of the nose, &c.

A LAGRECQUE, } A name for one of A LA GREC, } the varieties of the fret ornament.

AL'ALITE, n. A crystalized mineral; diopside; a semi-transparent pyroxene. A variety with twelve-sided prisms, was found by Bonvoisin, near the village of Ala in Piedmont, and by him called Alalite.

ALAMIRE', n. The lowest note but one in Guido Aretine's scale of music.

ALAMODAL'ITY, n. Conformity to the prevailing mode, or fashion of the times. [Lit. us.]

ALĂRM', v. t. To give notice of danger; to rouse to vigilance, and exertions for safety.—2. To call to arms for defence. 3. To surprise with apprehension of danger; to disturb with terror; to fill with anxiety by the prospect of evil.

ALĂRM'-BELL, n. A bell that gives notice of danger.

ALĂRM'ED, pp. Notified of sudden danger; surprised with fear; roused to vigilance or activity by apprehension of approaching danger; solicitous at the prospect or expectation of evil. Thus, we are alarmed at the approach of danger, or alarmed for the safety of friends at sea.

ALÄRM'ING, ppr. Giving notice of approaching danger; rousing to vigilance; exciting solicitude by a prospect of evil.

ALÄRM'ING, a. Exciting apprehension; terrifying; awakening a sense of danger; as, an alarming message.

ALÄRM'INGLY, adv. With alarm; in a manner to excite apprehension.

ALÄRM'IST, n. One that excites alarm; one who is prone to take alarm at, and to circulate and exaggerate any sort of bad news, particularly in regard of political matters.

ALÄRM'-POST, n. A place to which troops are to repair in case of an alarm.

ALÄRM'-WATCH, n. A watch that strikes the hour by regulated movement.

ALARUM, for Alarm, is a corruption, and is not to be used.

ALA'RY, a. [Lat. ala, a wing.] Wing-shaped; an epithet used in anat. and bot.

ALAS', exclam. [Dutch, helaas; Fr. hélas.] An exclamation expressive of sorrow, grief, pity, concern, or apprehension of evil; sometimes followed by day or while; alas the day, like alack a day; or alas the while.† Spenser, expressing an unhappy time.

ALĀTE,† adv. Lately.

ALĀTED, or ALĀTE, a. [L. ala, a wing; alatus, winged.] Winged, having dilatations like wings. In bot., applied to stems and leaf stalks, when the edges or angles are longitudinally expanded into leaf-like borders. Applied also to shells having an expanded lip.

AL'ATERN, n. A trivial name of a species of rhamnus or buckthorn.

ALB, n. [L. albus, Gr. ἀλφος, white.] A surplice or vestment of white linen, reaching to the feet, worn by the Romish clergy. Also a Turkish coin, called also an asper, value a little more than a halfpenny.

AL'BA FIR'MA, or AL'BUM, n. In law, a yearly rent paid to the chief lord of a hundred in white money or silver, in distinction from that paid in grain, &c, which was called redditus nigri.

AL'BATROSS, n. An aquatic fowl, belonging to the order of Anfers. The bill is straight; the upper mandible crooked at the point, and the lower one truncated; the nostrils are oval, open and little prominent, and placed on the sides; the wings are pennated, and there are three webbed toes on each foot. The upper part of the body is of a spotted brown, and the belly white. The common albatross is the species most generally met with in the southern ocean. Some of these birds measure upwards of fourteen feet from wing to wing, and have been known to accompany ships for whole days without ever resting on the waves.

ALBE'IT. [This is supposed to be a compound of all, be, and it, and is equivalent to admit, or grant it all.] Be it so; admit all that; although; notwithstanding.

Whereas ye say, The Lord saith it, albeit I have not spoken; Eze. xiii.

[This word is nearly antiquated.]

AL'BELEN, n. A fish of the truttaceous or trout kind, found in the German lakes, weighing five or six pounds.

ALBES'CENT, a. [L. albesco, to grow white.] Becoming white; or rather, whitish; moderately white.

AL'BICORE, n. [Port. albacor; al and bacoro, a little pig.] A marine fish, like a tunny, noted for following ships.

ALBIFICA'TION, n. The act of making white.

ALBIGEN'SES, ALBIGEOIS', n. A party of Reformers, who separated from the Church of Rome in the 12th century; so called from the Albigeois, a small territory in France, where they resided. They are sometimes confounded with the Waldenses; but they were prior to them in time, differed from them in some of their tenets, and resided in a different part of France. The Catholics made war upon them, and they gradually dwindled, till the Reformation, when the remains of them fell in with the followers of Zwinglius and the Genevan Protestants.

AL'BIN, n. [L. albus, white.] A mineral, of an opaque white colour, regarded as a variety of Bohemian apophyllite.

ALBIN'ISM, n. Nature or state of albinos.

ALBI'NO, n. A person of preternaturally white complexion, with light hair and pink eyes. Albinos are occasionally found, as a variety of the human race, in every climate, but nowhere as a people. They are called dondos in Africa, bedhas in Ceylon, and chacrelas in Java Born usually of dark or copper-coloured parents, they are feeble in body, usually short-lived; and the males, says M. Leroux, are nearly all impotent, though the females are not generally so. They see ill in the daytime, and best by twilight.

AL'BION, n. An ancient name of England, still used in poetry. It is supposed this name was given to it on account of its white cliffs.

AL'BITE, n. Tetrarto-prismatic felspar; soda felspar. A name given to felspar, whose alkali is soda instead of potash. Albite forms a constituent part of the green stone rocks in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh.

ALBI'TIC, a. Of the nature of albite; containing albite.

ALBO'RA, n. A sort of itch or rather leprosy, terminating without ulceration, but with fœtid evacuations in the mouth and nostrils.

ALBO'RO, n The erythrinus, a small red fish of the Mediterranean.

ALBUGIN'EOUS, a. [L. albugo, the white spot in the eye, from albus, white.] Pertaining to or resembling the white of the eye, or of an egg.

Albugineous humour, the aqueous humour of the eye.

Albugineous tunic, is the external covering of the eye-ball, formed by the tendons of the muscles which surround it.

ALBU'GO, n. The white speck in the eye, called the film, haw, dragon, pearl, or cicatrice. Also a disease of the eye, occasioned by a white opaque spot growing on the cornea and obstructing vision. It is called also leucoma, nebula, pannus oculi, onyx, unguis, &c.

ALBU'LA, n. A species of truttaceous fish, destitute of teeth. The Albula Indica is called by the Dutch wit-fish, and is of the size of a herring. The Albula nobilis is a fish caught in the lakes of Germany.

AL'BUM, n. [L. albus, white.] 1. Among the Romans, a white table, board, or register, on which the names of public officers and public transactions were entered.—2. A book, originally blank, in which foreigners or strangers insert autographs of celebrated persons, or in which friends insert pieces as memorials for each other.

AL'BUM GRÆ'CUM, n. The dung of dogs, which from exposure to the air, becomes white like chalk. It was formerly used as a medicine.

ALBU'MEN, n. [L. from albus, white.] A substance so named from the Latin, for the white of an egg, in which it exists abundantly, and in its purest natural state. It enters largely into the composition of the animal fluids and solids. It abounds in the serum of the blood, the vitreous, and crystalline humours of the eye, the fluid of dropsy, and the substance called coagulable lymph. In bot., it is applied to the farinaceous matter which surrounds the embryo. It is abundant in palms, wheat, &c. Vegetable albumen of chemists, resembles animal albumen, especially in coagulating by heat. It is found in emulsive seeds generally, and exists in the sap of many plants. It is liable to undergo putrefactive fermentation, yielding ammonia, and emitting a disagreeable odour.

ALBU'MINOUS, a. Pertaining to, or having the properties of albumen. In bot., applied to the plants whose seeds contain albumen in a separate state; as all kinds of grain, palms, &c.

AL'BURN, } n. [L. alburnum, from
ALBURN'UM, } albus, white.] The white and softer part of the wood of exogenous plants, between the inner bark and the heart-wood. It is often called sap-wood, and is gradually transformed into heart-wood or duramen.

AL'BURN, n. [L. alburnus, from albus, white.] A fish called the bleak. It belongs to the order of Abdominals, and the genus Cyprinus. It is five or six inches in length, and esteemed delicious food. Artificial pearls are made of its scales.

AL'CAHEST, or AL'KAHEST, n. [Ar.] A pretended universal solvent, or menstruum. [See ALKAHEST.]

ALCA'IC, a. Pertaining to Alcæus, a lyric poet of Mitylene, in Lesbos, who flourished about the forty-fourth Olympiad; or to other poets of the same name, of which three are mentioned; one an Athenian tragic poet, and another a Messenian.

ALCA'ICS, n. plur. Several kinds of verse, so called from Alcæus, their inventor. One kind consists of five feet, a spondee or iambic, an iambic, a long syllable and two dactyls.

ALCĀID, n. [Sp. alcayde; Ar. kaidon, with the prefix al, from kada, to lead, rule, govern. Hence the Cadi of the Turks.] Among the Moors, Spaniards, and Portuguese, a governor. In Portugal, the chief civil magistrate of a town or city; also the jurisdiction of certain judges of appeal. In Spain, the governor of a castle or fort; also a jailer.

ALCAN'NA, n. [Ar.] A plant, a species of Lawsonia; and a powder, prepared from its leaves, used by the Turkish females to give a golden colour to the nails and hair. Infused in water, it forms a yellow colour; with vinegar, it forms a red. From the berries is extracted an oil, used in medicine. In Cairo, it forms an article of commerce.

AL'CATRAZ, n. The Spanish name of the Pelicanus Onocrotalus of Linnæus; a pelican; also a fish taken on the coast of India.

ALCAVALA, n. In Spain, a tax on every transfer of property, real or personal.

ALCE'DO, n. [L.] The king-fisher; a genus of birds, of the order of Picæ. The species are numerous. They usually live about rivers, feeding on fish, which they take by darting into the water with surprising velocity. [See HALCYON.]

King-Fisher (Alcedo ispida).

ALCHYM'IC, } a. Relating to al-
ALCHYM'ICAL, } chymy, or produced by it.

ALCHYM'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of alchymy.

AL'CHYMIST, n. One who practises alchymy.

ALCHYMIST'IC, } a. Practising
ALCHYMIST'ICAL, } alchymy, or relating to it.

AL'CHYMY, a. [It. alchimia; Ar. al, the, and kimia, secret, hidden, or the occult art, from hamai, to hide. See CHEMISTRY.] 1. The more sublime and difficult parts of chemistry, and chiefly such as relate to the transmutation of metals into gold, the finding a universal remedy for diseases, and an alkahest or universal solvent, and other things now treated as ridiculous. This pretended science was much cultivated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but is now held in contempt. It must, however, be acknowledged that the labours of the alchymist, although utterly absurd, and ridiculous as to their object, were the means of gradually forming a collection of facts, which led ultimately to the establishment of scientific chemistry.—2. Formerly, a mixed metal used for utensils.

Alchymist.

ALCMA'NIAN, a. Pertaining to Alcman, a lyric poet of the twenty-seventh Olympiad, celebrated for his amorous verses. The Alcmanian verse consisted of two dactyls and two trochees.

AL'CO, n. A quadruped of America, nearly resembling a dog, but mute and melancholy; and this circumstance seems to have given rise to the fable, that dogs transported to America become mute. The animal was used for food by the native Americans, and the first Spanish settlers; but it is said to be now extinct. It is known also by the name of Techichi.

AL'COHOL, n. [Ar. kahala; Heb. Syr. and Eth. כחל, kohol, to paint with a preparation of powder of antimony. The Oriental females still practise the painting of the eyebrows with this material. The name was applied to this substance, and afterwards to other fine powders, and to highly rectified spirits.] Pure or highly rectified spirit, obtained from fermented liquors by distillation. It consists of hydrogen, carbon, and oxygen. It is extremely light and inflammable, and a powerful stimulant and antiseptic. It is the intoxicating principle of all vinous and spirituous liquors, as wine, ale, brandy, whisky, &c.; but, as it was first procured from wine, it has retained the name of spirit of wine. Alcohol in combination with a variable proportion of water and essential oil, constitutes the different kinds of ardent spirits so much used in almost every country of the globe It can be produced from no substance by distillation, unless that substance has been previously subjected to the vinous fermentation. It combines with water in every proportion, and is frequently used as a solvent in chemical operations, and for filling thermometers. Equal quantities of water and alcohol form what is called proof spirit. When pure, it is a clear colourless fluid, of a penetrating odour and hot pungent taste.

AL'COHOLATES, n. Salts in which alcohol appears to replace the water of crystallization.

ALCOHOL'IC, a. Pertaining to alcohol, or partaking of its qualities.

ALCOHOLIZA'TION, n. The act of rectifying spirit, till it is wholly dephlegmated; or of reducing a substance to an impalpable powder.

AL'COHOLIZE, v. t. To convert into alcohol; to rectify spirit till it is wholly dephlegmated; also, to reduce a substance to an impalpable powder.

AL'COR, n. [Ar.] A small star adjoining to the large bright one in the middle of the tail of Ursa Major.

ALCORAN. See KORAN and ALKORAN.

ALCOVE, n. [Sp. alcoba, composed of al, with the Ar. kabba, to arch, to construct with an arch, and its derivatives, an arch, a round house; Eng. cubby.] 1. A recess in a room, separated from it by a screen of columns, or by a balustrade, or by draperies, for the reception of a bed, and having its floor generally raised above the floor of the room. —2. A lateral recess in a library for the reception of books.—3. An arched or covered seat in a garden.

AL'CYON, n. A trivial name of the king-fisher. [See HALCYON.]

ALCYO'NE, n. The name of the bright star, marked γ in the Pleiades.

AL'CYONITE, n. [Supra.] A fossil zoophyte, somewhat resembling a fungus.

ALCYO'NIUM, n. The name of a submarine plant, or bastard sponge. Also a kind of astroit or coral, a fossil found in England. In zool., a genus of animals belonging to the class of zoophytes.

ALD'EBARAN, n. A star of the first magnitude in the constellation Taurus; vulgarly called the bull's eye.

AL'DEHYDE, or AL'DEHYD, n. A new substance discovered by Liebig, as a product of the oxidation of alcohol, and ether. It is a colourless, limpid, and very volatile liquid, of a peculiar, suffocating odour. When exposed to air or oxygen, it becomes entirely converted into acetic acid or vinegar.

Resin of aldehyd, a product of the decomposition of the aqueous solution of aldehyd by caustic potash.

ALDEHYDAMMO"NIA, n. A compound of aldehyde and ammonia. It may be obtained by distilling six parts of sulphuric acid, mixed with four of water, four of alcohol, and six of hyperoxide of manganese in fine powder. Its crystals are transparent, brilliant, acute, rhombic prisms.

AL'DEHYDIC ACID, n. An acid which is formed when an aqueous solution of aldehyde is warmed with oxide of silver. It is sour, and neutralizes metallic oxides. Its salts are termed aldehydates.

AL'DER, n. [L. alnus; Fr. aune, aulne; Sax. alr.] A tree, usually growing in moist land, and belonging to the genus

Alder (Alnus glutinosa).

Alnus. The wood of the alder has the quality of long endurance under water.

AL'DERMAN, n. plur. Aldermen. [Sax. ald, or eald, old, comp. alder, older and man.] 1. Among our Saxon ancestors, a senior or superior. The title was applied to princes, dukes, earls, senators, and presiding magistrates; also to archbishops and bishops, implying superior wisdom or authority. Thus, Ethelstan, duke of the East-Anglians, was called alderman of all England; and there were aldermen of cities, counties, and castles, who had jurisdiction within their respective districts.—2. In present usage, a magistrate or officer of a town corporate, next in rank below the mayor. The number of aldermen is different in different cities. In London, the number is twenty-six, one in each ward, and the office is held for life. In the United States, the number of aldermen depends on the charters of incorporation. In general aldermen have the powers of a justice of the peace, and, with the mayor, they constitute the court of the corporation. In most of the cities, they are annually elected by the citizens.

AL'DERMANLIKE, a. Like an alderman.

AL'DERMANLY, a. Pertaining to or like an alderman.

AL'DERN, a. Made of alder.

ALDHAF'ERA. A star of the third magnitude in the constellation Leo.

ALE, n. [Sax. eala, eale, or aloth; Qu. Ir. olum, to drink.] 1. A liquor made from an infusion of malt by fermentation. It differs from beer, in having a smaller proportion of hops. It is of different sorts, chiefly pale and brown; the first made from malt slightly dried; the second, from malt more considerably dried or roasted. Ale was the common drink of the ancient inhabitants of Europe. It is usually made with barley; but sometimes with wheat, rye, millet, oats, &c.—2. A merry meeting in English country places, so called from the liquor drunk.—Medicated ales are those which are prepared for medicinal purposes, by an infusion of herbs during fermentation.

ALE-BENCH, n. A bench in or before an ale-house.

ALE-BERRY, n. A beverage made by boiling ale with spice, sugar, and sops of bread.

ALE-BREWER, n. One whose occupation is to brew ale.

ALE-CONNER, n. [ale and con, to know or see.] An officer in London, whose business is to inspect the measures used in public-houses, to prevent frauds in selling liquors. Four of these are chosen annually by the liverymen, in common hall, on midsummer's day.

ALE-COST, n. Costmary, a plant, a species of Tanacetum.

ALE-FED, a. Fed with ale.

ALE-GAR, n. [ale, and Fr. aigre, sour.] Sour ale; the acid of ale.

ALE-GILL, n. A kind of medicated liquor, from the infusion of ground-ivy in malt liquor.

ALE-HOOF, n. [D. eiloof, a plant used in brewing.] Ground-ivy, the Glechoma hederacea of Linnæus. The leaves of this plant are used to clarify and give flavour to ale.

ALE-HOUSE, n. A house where ale is retailed; and hence a tippling-house.

ALE-HOUSE-KEEPER, n. One who keeps an ale-house.

ALE-KNIGHT, n. A pot companion.

ALE-SHOT, n. A reckoning to be paid for ale.

ALE-SILVER, n. A duty paid to the lord mayor of London, by the sellers of ale within the city.

ALE-STAKE, n. A stake set as a sign before an ale-house.

ALE-TASTER, n. An officer appointed in every court leet, and sworn to inspect ale, beer, and bread, and examine the quality and quantity within the precincts of the lordship.

ALE-VAT, n. A vat in which ale is fermented.

ALE-WASHED, a. Steeped or soaked in ale.

ALE-WIFE, n. A woman who keeps an ale-house.

ALEWIFE, or A'LOOF, n. This word is properly aloof, the Indian name of a fish. [See WINTHROP on the culture of maize in America, Phil. Trans. No. 142, p. 1065, and Baddam's Memoirs, vol. 2, 131.] An American fish, belonging to the genus Clupea, and called Clupea serrata. It resembles the herring. The established pronunciation is ale-wife, plur., ale-wives.

ALECTO'RIA, n. [ἀλέκτωρ, cock.] Cock-stone. A peculiar stone, supposed to be sometimes found in the stomach or liver of the cock or capon when aged. Many virtues were attributed to it in former times, but these, as well as the origin of the stone, are imaginary.

ALECTOROM'ACHY, or ALECTRYOM'ACHY, n. [Gr. ἀλέκτωρ, a cock, and μάχη, a fight.] Cock-fighting.

ALECTRYOM'ANCY, n. [Gr. ἀλεκτρυών, a cock, and μαντεία, divination.] An ancient practice of foretelling events by means of a cock. The twenty-four letters were laid on the ground, and a grain of corn on each; a cock was then permitted to pick up the grains, and the letters under the grains selected, being formed into words were supposed to foretel the event desired.

ALEE', adv. [a or at and lee. See LEE.] In seamen's lan., on the side opposite to the wind, that is, opposite to the side on which it strikes. The helm of a ship is alee, when pressed close to the lee side. Hard alee, or luff alee, is an order to put the helm to the lee side. Helm's alee, that is, the helm is alee, a notice given as an order to the seamen to cause the head-sails to shake in the wind, with a view to bring the ship about.

A'LEGER,† a. [Fr., Sp. alégre; L. alacer.] Gay; cheerful; sprightly.

ALERT', a. [Fr. alerte; Sp. alerto, vigilant, watchful, estar alerta, to be on the watch.] 1. Watchful; vigilant; active in vigilance. Hence the military phrase, upon the alert, upon the watch, guarding against surprise or danger.—2. Brisk; nimble; moving with celerity.

ALERT'NESS, n. Briskness; nimbleness; sprightliness; levity.

ALEUROM'ANCY, n. [Gr. ἄλευρον, meal, and μαντεία, divination.] A kind of divination by meal, used by the ancients.

ALEU'TIAN, or ALEU'TIC, a. Designating certain isles belonging to Russia, and separating the sea of Kamtschatka from the northern part of the Pacific ocean, extending nearly 900 miles from east to west. They form a chain connecting Asia and America. The inhabitants belong to the same stock with the natives of Kamtschatka; and are a harmless race of fishers and hunters. The word is formed from aleut, which, in Russian, is a bald rock.

ALEXAN'DERS, n. The name of a plant of the genus Smyrnium.

ALEXAN'DER'S FOOT, n. The name of a plant.

ALEXAN'DRIAN, a. Pertaining to Alexandria. There are many cities of this name, in various parts of the earth. The term is often applied as an attribute, or used as a noun, for one who professed or taught the sciences in the school of Alexandria, in Egypt; a place highly celebrated for its literature and magnificence, and whose library, it is said, consisted of 700,000 volumes. The Persians and Turks write for Alexander, Scander or Sconder; and for Alexandria, Scanderona; hence Scanderoon, a sea-port in Syria.

ALEXAN'DRINE, or ALEXAN'DRIAN, n. A kind of verse consisting of twelve syllables, or of twelve and thirteen alternately; so called from a poem written in French on the life of Alexander. This species of verse is peculiar to modern poetry, but well adapted to epic poems. The Alexandrine in English consists of twelve syllables, and is less used than this kind of verse is among the French, whose tragedies are generally composed of Alexandrines.

ALEXIPHARM'AC, a. [Gr. ἀλέξω, to expel, and φάρμακον, poison.] Expelling poison; antidotal; sudorific; that has the quality of expelling poison or infection by sweat.

ALEXIPHARM'AC, n. A medicine that is intended to obviate the effects of poison; an antidote to poison or infection. By the Greeks, the word was used for an amulet.

ALEXITER'IC, } a. [Gr. ἀλέξω, to expel, and δηλητήριον, ALEXITE'RIAL, } poison.] Resisting poison; obviating the effects of venom.

ALEXITER'IC, n. A medicine to resist the effects of poison, or the bite of venomous animals; nearly synonymous with alexipharmac. Used also by the Greeks for an amulet.

ALGÆ, n. [L. alga, sea-weed.] An order or division of the cryptogamic or acrogenous class of plants. The whole of the sea-weeds are comprehended under this division. These plants are described as having their leaf, stem, and root all one; some of the algæ live at the depth of 1000 feet below the surface of the water.

Algæ. 1 Fucus vesiculosus. 2 Odonthalia dentata.

AL'GAROT, or AL'GAROTH, n. The name of an emetic powder, prepared from the regulus of antimony, dissolved in acids, and separated by repeated lotions in warm water. It is either an Arabic term, or the name of the inventor, a physician of Verona.

AL'GATES,† adv. [Sax. algeats; all and geat, a gait, a way.] By all means; on any terms.

AL'GEBRA, n. [Ar. al and gaborun, the reduction of parts to a whole, or fractions to whole numbers, from the verb, which signifies to consolidate; Heb. Ch. Syr. and Eth. גבר, gebar, to be strong.] The science of quantity in general, or universal arithmetic. Algebra is a general method of computation, in which signs and symbols, which are commonly the letters of the alphabet, are made to represent numbers and quantities. It takes an unknown quantity sought, as if granted; and, by means of one or more quantities given, proceeds till the quantity supposed is discovered, by some other known quantity to which it is equal. It is necessary for explaining the foundations and investigating the rules of the more difficult parts of arithmetic; and by means of its symbols, it affords directions for computation often more concise, and sometimes more perspicuous, than any which rules expressed in ordinary language can convey. This science was of oriental discovery; but whether among the Arabians or Indians, is uncertain.

ALGEBRA'IC, } a. Pertaining to ALGEBRA'ICAL, } algebra; containing an operation of algebra, or deduced from such operation.

Algebraic curve, a figure whose intercepted diameters bear always the same proportion to their respective ordinates.—Algebraic equation, an equation of which the terms contain only algebraic quantities.—Algebraic geometry, a name given to the application of algebra to the solution of geometrical problems.

ALGEBRA'ICALLY, adv. By algebraic process.

AL'GEBRAIST, n. One who is versed in the science of algebra.

AL'GEBRAIZE, v. t. To perform by algebra, to reduce to algebraic form.

AL'GORITHM, or AL'GORISM, n. An Arabic term, signifying numerical computation, or the six operations of arithmetic. 2. The art of computing in reference to some particular subject, or in some particular way; as the algorithm of numbers, the algorithm of the differential calculus.

AL'GOUS, a. [L. alga, sea-weed.] Pertaining to sea-weed; abounding with, or like sea-weed.

ALHEN'NA, n. See ALKENNA.

ALHIR'TO, n. A star of the third magnitude, in the constellation Capricorn.

A'LIAS, [L.] Otherwise; as in this example, Simson alias Smith; a word used in judicial proceedings to connect the different names by which a person is called, who attempts to conceal his true name, and pass under a fictitious one.

A'LIAS, n. A second writ, or execution, issued when the first has failed to enforce the judgment.

AL'IBI, n. [L.] Elsewhere; in another place; a law term. When a person is charged with an offence, and he proves that he could not have committed it, because he was, at the time, in another place, he is said to prove an alibi. The part of a plea or allegation, which avers the party to have been in another place, is also called an alibi.

A'LIEN, a. (ālyen.) [L. alienus, from alius, another; Ir. aile, eile, oile, another; W. all, other, and ail, second; Gr. ἀλλος. Hence, L. alieno, to alienate; alter, another; whence Fr. alterer, to alter; L. alterno, to alter, to alternate, and alterco, altercor, to altercate.] 1. Foreign; not belonging to the same country, land or government. 2. Belonging to one who is not a citizen.—3. Estranged; foreign; not allied; adverse to; as, principles alien from our religion.

A'LIEN, n. (ālyen.) A foreigner; one born in, or belonging to another country; one who is not a denizen, or entitled to the privileges of a citizen.—2. In scrip., one who is a stranger to the church of Christ, or to the covenant of grace.

At that time, ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; Eph. ii.

In France, a child born of residents who are not citizens is an alien. In Great Britain, the children of aliens born in that country are mostly natural born subjects and the children of British subjects owing allegiance to the crown of England, though born in other countries, are natural subjects, and entitled to the privileges of resident citizens. An alien is incapable of inheriting lands in England till naturalized by act of parliament; and in Scotland he is not entitled either to acquire or to succeed to property.

Alien-duty, a tax upon goods imported by aliens, beyond the duty on the like goods imported by citizens; a discriminating duty on the tonnage of ships belonging to aliens, or any extra duties imposed by laws or edicts on aliens.

ALIENABIL'ITY, n. The capacity of being alienated or transferred.

The alienability of the domain. Burke.

A'LIENABLE, a. That may be sold, or transferred to another; as, land is alienable according to the laws of the state.

A'LIENAGE, n. The state of being an alien.

Why restore estates, forfeitable on account of alienage? Story.

A'LIENATE, v. t. [L. alieno.] 1. To transfer title, property or right to another; as, to alienate lands or sovereignty.—2 To estrange; to withdraw, as the affections; to make indifferent or averse, where love or friendship before subsisted; with from; as, to alienate the heart or affections; to alienate a man from the friends of his youth.—3. To apply to a wrong use.

They shall not alienate the first-fruits of the land; Ezek. xlviii.

The law was very gentle in the construction of the disability of alienism. Kent.

A'LIEN WATERS, n. Any stream of water carried across an irrigated field or meadow, but which is not employed in the process of irrigation.

ALIFE, adv. [a or on and life.] On my life.

ALIF'EROUS, a. [L. ala, wing, and fero, to bear.] Having wings.

AL'IFORM, a. [L. ala, wing, and forma, shape.] Having the shape of a wing; a term applied to a certain process and muscles of the body, as the pterygoid process, and the muscles arising from that process.

ALIG'EROUS, a. [L. ala, wing, and gero, to carry.] Having wings.

ALIGHT, v. i. [Sax. alihtan, gelihtan, lihtan. See LIGHT.] 1. To get down or descend, as from on horseback or from a carriage.—2. To descend and settle; as, a flying bird alights on a tree.—3. To fall or descend and lodge; as, snow alights on a roof.

ALIGN, v. t. [Fr. aline.] To adjust to a line; to lay out or regulate by a line.

ALIGNMENT, n. [Fr.] A laying out or regulating by a line; an adjusting to a line.

ALIKE, a. [Sax. gelic. See LIKE.] Having resemblance or similitude; similar.

The darkness and the light are both alike to thee; Ps. xlii.

[This adjective never precedes the noun which it qualifies.]

ALIKE, adv. In the same manner, form or degree; as, we are all alike concerned in religion.

He fashioneth their hearts alike; Ps. xxxiii.

ALIKE-MINDED, a. Having the same mind; but like-minded is more generally used.

AL'IMENT, v. t. To maintain. In Scots law, parents and children are reciprocally bound to aliment each other. In like manner, life renters are bound to aliment the heirs and fiars, and creditors their imprisoned debtors, when they are unable to support themselves.

AL'IMENT, n. [L. alimentum, from alo, to feed; Ir. alaim, ailim, olaim, to feed or nurse.] That which nourishes; food; nutriment; any thing which feeds or adds to a substance, animal or vegetable, in natural growth.

ALIMENT'AL, a. Supplying food that has the quality of nourishing; that furnishes the materials for natural growth; as, chyle is alimental; alimental sap.

ALIMENT'ALLY, adv. So as to serve for nourishment or food.

ALIMENT'ARINESS, n. The quality of supplying nutriment.

ALIMENT'ARY, a. Pertaining to aliment or food; having the quality of nourishing; as, alimentary particles.

The alimentary canal, in animal bodies, is the great duct or intestine, by which aliments are conveyed through the body, and the useless parts evacuated

Alimentary law, among the Romans, was a law which obliged children to support their parents.

Obligation of aliment, in Scots law, is the natural obligation of parents to provide for their children.

ALIMENTA'TION, n. The act or power of affording nutriment.—2. The state of being nourished.

ALIMO'NIOUS, a. [See ALIMONY.] Nourishing; affording food. [Lit. us.]

AL'IMONY, n. [L. alimonia, of alo, to feed. See ALIMENT.] An allowance made for the support of a woman legally separated from her husband. The sum is fixed by the proper judge, and granted out of the husband's estate.

AL'IPED, a. [L. ala, wing, and pes. foot.] Wing-footed; having the toes connected by a membrane, which serves as a wing.

AL'IPED, n. [Supra.] An animal whose toes are connected by a membrane, and which thus serve for wings; a cheiropter; as, the bat.

Aliped, Long-eared Bat

AL'IQUANT, a. [L. aliquantum, a little.] In arith., an aliquant number or part, is that which does not measure another number without a remainder. Thus 5 is an aliquant part of 16, for 3 times 5 is 15, leaving a remainder 1.

AL'IQUOT, a. [L.] An aliquot part of a number or quantity is one which will measure it without a remainder. Thus 5 is an aliquot part of 15.

A'LISH, a. [From ale] Like ale; having the qualities of ale.

ALISMA'CEÆ, n. A natural order of plants belonging to the Monocotyledonous division of flowering plants. All the species are aquatic plants; one species, the water plantain, (alism.plantago,) is common in ditches in Britain.

ALITE',† adv A little.

AL'ITRUNK, n. [L. ala, a wing, and trunk.] The segment of the body of an insect to which the wings are attached.

ALIVE, a. [Sax. gelifian, to live, from lifian, to live. See LIFE.] 1. Having life, in opposition to dead; living; being in a state in which the organs perform their functions, and the fluids move, whether in animals or vegetables; as, the man or plant is alive.—2. In a state of action; unextinguished; undestroyed; unexpired; in force or operation; as, keep the process alive.—3. Cheerful; sprightly; lively; full of alacrity; as, the company were all alive.—4. Susceptible; easily impressed; having lively feelings, as when the mind is solicitous about some event; as, one is alive to whatever is interesting to a friend. - 5. Exhibiting motion or moving bodies in great numbers; as, the city was all alive, when the general entered.—6. In a scriptural sense, regenerated; born again.

For this my son was dead and is alive; Luke xv.

[This adjective always follows the noun which it qualifies.

AL'KAHEST, n. [Ar.] A universal solvent; a menstruum capable of dissolving every body, which Paracelsus and Van Helmont pretended they possessed. This pretence no longer imposes on the credulity of any man. The word is sometimes used for fixed salts volatilized.

ALKAHEST'IC, a. Pertaining to the alkahest.

ALKALES'CENCY, n. [See ALKALI.] A tendency to become alkaline; or a tendency to the properties of an alkali; or the state of a substance in which alkaline properties begin to be developed, or to be predominant.

ALKALES'CENT, a. Tending to the properties of an alkali; slightly alkaline.

AL'KALI, n. plur. Alkalies. [Ar. kali, with the common prefix, the plant called glass wort, from its use in the manufacture of glass; or the ashes of the plant, which seems to be its primitive sense, for the verb signifies to fry.] A salifiable base, having in a greater or less degree a peculiar acrid taste, the power of changing blue vegetable colours to a green, and the colour of turmeric and rhubarb to a brown. The alkalies have been arranged into three classes. 1. Those which consist of a metallic base combined with oxygen, viz., potash, soda, and lithia. 2. That which contains no oxygen, viz., ammonia. 3. Those containing oxygen, hydrogen, and carbon, viz., aconita, brucia, datura, delphia, hyosciama, morphia, strychnia, quinia, cinchonia, and perhaps some other truly vegetable alkalies. The earths, lime, baryta, and strontia, were formerly enrolled among the alkalies, because they agree with them in causticity, solubility in water, and in their effects on vegetable colours, (magnesia agrees with the alkalies in this last particular.) But these earths differ so completely from the alkalies in other properties, that they have been kept separate by later chemists, under the title of alkaline earths.

AL'KALIFIED, pp. Converted into an alkali.

AL'KALIFIABLE, a. That may be alkalified, or converted into an alkali.

AL'KALIFY, v. t. To form, or to convert into an alkali.

AL'KALIFY, v. i. To become an alkali.

ALKALIG'ENOUS, a. [Alkali and γεναω, to generate.] Producing or generating alkali.

ALKALIM'ETER, n. [Alkali, and Gr. μετρον, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength of alkalies, or the quantity of alkali in potash and soda, by the quantity of dilute sulphuric acid, of a known strength, which a certain weight of them would neutralize.

ALKALIM'ETRY, n. The process for testing alkalies.

AL'KALINE, a. Having the properties of an alkali. Alkaline earths, lime, magnesia, baryta, strontia. [See ALKALI.]

ALKALIN'ITY, n. The quality which constitutes an alkali.

ALKA'LIOUS, a. Having the properties of alkali.

AL'KALIZATE,† a. Alkaline; impregnated with alkali.

ALKALIZA'TION, n. The act of rendering alkaline by impregnating with an alkali.

AL'KALIZE, v. t. [and formerly Alkalizate.] To make alkaline; to communicate the properties of an alkali to, by mixture.

AL'KALOID, n. [from alkali and ειδος.] A body resembling an alkali, or possessing some of the properties of an alkali. The alkaloids are numerous. All which have been accurately analyzed, are composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen, and their differences in comparison with each other depend upon a variation in the proportions of their component elements.

AL'KANET, n. A species of Anchusa. The root is used to impart a deep red colour to oily substances, ointments, plasters, &c.

AL'KARSINE, n. A liquid obtained when acetate of potash, mixed with its own weight of arsenious acid is subjected to dry distillation. It is characterised by its insupportable smell, and a high degree of spontaneous combustibility.

ALKEKEN'GI, n. The winter cherry, a species of Physalis. The plant bears a near resemblance to solanum, or night-shade. The berry is medicinal.

ALKEN'NA, or ALHEN'NA, n. Egyptian privet, a species of Lawsonia. The pulverized leaves of this plant are much used by the Eastern nations for staining their nails yellow. The powder, being wet, forms a paste, which is bound on the nails for a night, and the colour thus given will last several weeks.

ALKERM'ES, n. [Ar. See KERMES.] In phar., a compound cordial, in the form of a confection, derived from the kermes berries. Its other ingredients are said to be pippin-cider, rose-water, sugar, ambergris, musk, cinnamon, aloes-wood, pearls, and leaf-gold.

ALKER'VA, n. An Arabic name of the Palma Christi.

AL'KORAN, n. [Ar. al, the, and koran, book. The Book by way of eminence, as we say the Bible. See KORAN. It is pronounced, I believe, by orientalists, alkorawn.] The book which contains the Mohammedan doctrines of faith and practice. It was written by Mohammed, in the dialect of the Koreish, which is the purest Arabic; but the Arabian language has suffered such changes since it was written, that the language of the Koran is not now intelligible to the Arabians themselves, without being learned like other dead languages.

AL'KORAN, or AL'CORAN, is also the name of a high tower on Persian buildings.

AL'KORANIST, n. One who adheres strictly to the letter of the Koran, rejecting all comments. The Persians are generally Alkoranists; the Turks, Arabs, and Tartars, admit a multitude of traditions.

ALKUS'SA, n. A fish of the Silurus kind, with one beard only under the chin.

ALL, a. (awl'). [Sax. eal; G. all; W. oll or holl; Gr. ὅλος: Shemitic כל, hal, from כלה, calah, to be ended or completed, to perfect. The Welsh retains the first radical letter. This is radically the same word as heal; for in Sw. hel, and in Dan. hele, signify all, and these words are from the root of heal. See CALL, HEAL, and WHOLE.] 1. Every one, or the whole number of particulars.—2. The whole quantity, extent, duration, amount, quality, or degree; as, all the wheat; all the land; all the year; all the strength. This word signifies then, the whole or entire thing, or all the parts or particulars which compose it. It always precedes the definitive adjectives the, my, thy, his, our, your, their: as, all the cattle; all my labour; all thy goods; all his wealth; all our families; all your citizens; all their property. This word, not only in popular language, but in the Scriptures, often signifies, indefinitely, a large portion or number, or a great part. Thus all the cattle in Egypt died; all Judea and all the region round about Jordan; all men held John as a prophet; are not to be understood in a literal sense, but as including a large part or very great numbers. This word is prefixed to many other words to enlarge their signification; as, already, always, all-prevailing.

ALL, adv. Wholly; completely; entirely; as, all along; all bedewed; all over; my friend is all for amusement; I love my father all. In the ancient phrases, all too dear, all so long, this word retains its appropriate sense; as, "he thought them sixpence all too dear," that is, he thought them too dear by the sum of sixpence. In the sense of although, as "all were it as the rest," and in the sense of just, or at the moment, as "all as his straying flock he fed," it is obsolete, or restricted to poetry.

It is all one, is a phrase equivalent to the same thing in effect; that is, it is wholly the same thing. All the better, is equivalent to wholly the better; that is, better by the whole difference.

ALL, n. The whole number; as, all have not the same disposition; that is, all men.—2. The whole; the entire thing; the aggregate amount; as, our all is at stake.

> And Laban said, All that thou seest is mine; Gen. xxxi.

This adjective is much used as a noun, and applied to persons or things. All in all, is a phrase which signifies, all things to a person, or every thing desired.

> Thou shalt be all in all, and I in thee, > Forever. Milton.

When the words, and all, close an enumeration of particulars, the word all is either intensive, or is added as a general term to express what is not enumerated; as, a tree fell, nest, eagles, and all. At all, is a phrase much used by way of enforcement or emphasis, usually in negative or interrogative sentences. He has no ambition at all; that is, not in the least degree. Has he any property at all? All and some, in Spenser, Mason interprets, one and all. But from Lye's Saxon Dictionary, it appears that the phrase is a corruption of the Sax. ealle æt somne, all together, all at once, from somne, together, at once. [See LYE, under somne.] All in the wind, in seaman's language, is a phrase denoting that the sails are parallel with the course of the wind, so as to shake. All is well, is a watchman's phrase, expressing a state of safety. All, in composition, enlarges the meaning, or adds force to a word; and it is generally more emphatical than most. In some instances, all is incorporated into words, as in almighty, already, always; but in most instances, it is an adjective prefixed to other words, but separated by a hyphen.

ALL-BOUN'TEOUS, } a. Perfectly
ALL-BOUN'TIFUL, } bountiful; of infinite bounty.

ALL-FOOL'S-DAY, n. The first of April.

ALL-FOURS, n. [all and four.] A game at cards, played by two or four persons; so called from the possession of the four honours, by one person, who is then said to have all fours.

To go on all fours, is to move or walk on four legs, or on the two legs and two arms.

ALL-GOOD', n. The popular name of the plant Good-Henry, or English Mercury, Chenopodium bonus Henricus.

ALL-GRA'CIOUS, a. Perfectly gracious.

ALL-HAIL, exclam. [all and Sax. hal, health.] All health; a phrase of salutation, expressing a wish of all health, or safety to the person addressed.

ALL-HAL'LOW, or ALL-HAL'LOWS, n. All Saints day, the first of November; a feast dedicated to all the saints in general.

ALL-HALLOW-TIDE, n. [tid, in Sax. is time.] The time near All Saints, or November first.

ALL-HEAL, n. The name of a plant, the stachys of Linn.; wound-wort.

ALL-JUDG'ING, a. Judging all; possessing the sovereign right of judging.

ALL-JUST', a. Perfectly just.

ALL-LOV'ING, a. Of infinite love.

ALL-MER'CIFUL, a. Of perfect mercy or compassion.

ALL-POW'ERFUL, a. Almighty; omnipotent.

ALL-SAINTS-DAY, n. The first day of November, called also All-hallows; a feast in honour of all the saints.

ALL-SEED, n. A plant, the Chenopodium polyspermum of Linn.

ALL-SEE'ING, a. Seeing every thing.

ALL-SOULS-DAY, n. The second day of November; a feast or solemnity held by the church of Rome, to supplicate for the souls of the faithful deceased.

ALL'SPICE, n The fruit of eugenia pimento, a tree of the West Indies; a spice of a mildly pungent taste, and agreeably aromatic.

ALL-SUFFI''CIENT, a. Sufficient to every thing; infinitely able.

ALL-SUFFI''CIENT, n. The all-sufficient Being; God.

ALL-SURROUNDING a. Encompassing the whole.

> And all-to brake his skull; Judg. ix. 53.

ALL-WISE, a. Possessed of infinite wisdom.

ALL-WORSHIPPED, a. Worshipped or adored by all.

ALL-WORTHY, a. Of infinite worth; of the highest worth.

AL'LA, [Ital.] In music, an Italian preposition, or the dative of the feminine article la, which prefixed to certain words, has the power of the phrase, in the manner of; as, alla francese, in the French style or manner.

AL'LA-BREVE, [It. according to the Breve.] In music, a term signifying a quick time, in which the notes take only half their usual length.

AL'LA CAPELLA, [It. according to the chapel.] In music, the same as alla breve.

AL'LAGITE, n. A mineral, of a brown or green colour, massive, with a flat conchoidal fracture, and nearly opaque, found in the Hartz, near Elbingerode.

AL'LAH, [Ar. al and ilâh, the true God.] The Arabic name of the supreme Being, which, through the Koran, has found its way into the languages of all nations who have embraced the Mohammedan faith.

AL'LANITE, n. A mineral named from Mr. Allan, of Edinburgh, who first recognized it as a distinct species. It is massive, of a brownish black colour, and conchoidal fracture. A silicious oxide of cerium.

ALLANTO'IC ACID, n. An acid of animal origin found in the liquor of the allantois of the fetal calf. [See ALLANTOIS.] This is the same acid which was formerly called amniotic acid.

ALLAN'TOINE, n. The same as allantoic acid.

ALLANTOIS', or ALLANTOID', n. [Gr. ἀλλᾶς, a sausage, and εἶδος, form.] A thin membrane, situated between the chorion and amnion in quadrupeds, and forming one of the membranes which invest the fœtus in those animals.

AL'LATRATE,† v. t. [L. allatro.] To bark, as a dog.

ALLAY, v. t. [Sax. alecgan, alegan, to lay, to set, to depress, lecgan, to lay, to cast or strike down; G. legen, D. leggen, to lay; Gr. λέγω. The Fr. allier, to alloy, Sp. ligar, seems to be directly from the L. ligo, to bind; but this may be the same word differently applied, that is, to set, to fix, to make fast, to unite. Allay and alloy were formerly used indifferently; but I have recognised an entire distinction between them, applying alloy to metals.] 1. To make quiet; to pacify or appease; as, to allay the tumult of the passions, or to allay civil commotions.—2. To abate, mitigate, subdue, or destroy; as, to allay grief or pain.

> Females, who soften and allay the bitterness of adversity. Rawle.

3. To obtund or repress as acrimony; as, to allay the acrid qualities of a substance.—4. Formerly, to reduce the purity of; as, to allay metals. But, in this sense, alloy is now exclusively used. [See ALLOY.]

ALLAY, n. Formerly a baser metal mixed with a finer; but in this sense it is now written alloy, which see.—2. That which allays, or abates the predominant qualities; as, the allay of colours. Also, abatement; diminution by means of some mixture; as, joy without allay. But alloy is now more generally used.

ALLA͞YED, pp. Layed at rest; quieted; tranquillized; abated; [reduced by mixture.†]

ALLA͞YER, n. He, or that, which allays.

ALLA͞YING, ppr. Quieting; reducing to tranquillity; abating; [reducing by mixture.†]

ALLA͞YMENT, n. The act of quieting, or a state of tranquillity; a state of rest after disturbance; abatement; ease; as, the allayment of grief.

AL'LE, n. (ally). The little auk, or black and white diver.

ALLECTA'TION,† n. Enticement; allurement.

ALLEC'TIVE,† a. Alluring.

ALLEC'TIVE,† n. Allurement.

ALLEDGE'. See ALLEGE.

ALLEGA'NEAN, a. Pertaining to the mountains called Alleghany, or Alleghenny.

AL'LEGANY, or AL'LEGHANY, n. The chief ridge of the great chains of mountains which run from N. East to S. West, through the middle and southern states of North America; but more appropriately, the main or unbroken ridge, which casts all the waters on one side to the east, and on the other side to the west. This ridge runs from Pennsylvania to Georgia, and chains extend through the United States. This name is given also to the river Ohio, above its confluence with the Monongahela; but improperly, as the Indian name of the river to its source is Ohio.

ALLEGA'TION, n. Affirmation; positive assertion or declaration.—2. That which is affirmed or asserted; that which is offered as a plea, excuse, or justification.—3. In ecclesiast. courts, a formal complaint, or declaration of charges; also in civil law a producing of instruments or deeds to authorise or justify something.

ALLEǴE, v. t. [L. allego, ad and lego, to send; Fr. alleguer. This is only a modified application of the Eng. lay; L. loco, to set or throw.] 1. To declare; to affirm; to assert; to pronounce with positiveness; as, to allege a fact.—2. To produce as an argument, plea, or excuse; to cite or quote; as, to allege the authority of a judge.

ALLEǴEABLE, a. That may be alleged or affirmed.

ALLE'ǴEAS, or ALLEǴIAS, n. A stuff manufactured in the East Indies, of two kinds, one of cotton, the other of various plants, which are spun like flax.

ALLEǴ'ED, pp. Affirmed; asserted, whether as a charge or a plea.

ALLEǴ'EMENT,† n. Allegation.

ALLEǴ'ER, n. One who affirms or declares.

ALLE'ǴIANCE, n. [Old Fr. from L. alligo, of ad and ligo, to bind. See LIEGE and LEAGUE.] The tie or obligation of a subject to his prince, or government; the duty of fidelity to a king, government, or state. Every native or citizen owes allegiance to the government under which he is born. This is called natural or implied allegiance, which arises from the connection of a person with the society in which he is born, and his duty to be a faithful subject, independent of any express promise. Express allegiance is that obligation which proceeds from an express promise, or oath of fidelity. Local or temporary allegiance is due from an alien to the government or state in which he resides. Oath of allegiance. See OATH.

ALLEǴ'ING, ppr. Asserting; averring; declaring.

ALLEGOR'IC, | ALLEGOR'ICAL, } a. In the manner of allegory; figurative; describing by resemblances.

ALLEGOR'ICALLY, adv. In a figurative manner; by way of allegory.

ALLEGOR'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being allegorical.

AL'LEGORIST, n. One who uses allegory.

AL'LEGORIZE, v. t. To form an allegory; to turn into allegory; as, to allegorize the history of a people.—2. To understand in an allegorical sense; as, when a passage in a writer may be understood literally or figuratively, he who gives it a figurative sense, is said to allegorize it.

AL'LEGORIZE, v. i. To use allegory; as a man may allegorize, to please his fancy

AL'LEGORIZED, pp. Turned into allegory, or understood allegorically.

AL'LEGORIZING, ppr. Turning into allegory, or understanding in an allegorical sense.

AL'LEGORY, n. [Gr. αλληγορια, of αλλος, other, and αγορευω, to speak, from αγορα, a forum, an oration.] A figurative sentence or discourse, in which the principal subject is described by another subject resembling it in its properties and circumstances. The principal subject is thus kept out of view, and we are left to collect the intentions of the writer or speaker, by the resemblance of the secondary to the primary subject. Allegory is in words what hieroglyphics are in painting. We have a fine example of an allegory in the eightieth Psalm, in which God's chosen people are represented by a vineyard. The distinction in Scripture between a parable and an allegory, is said to be, that a parable is a supposed history, and an allegory, a figurative description of real facts. An allegory is called a continued metaphor. The following line in Virgil is an example of an allegory.

Claudite jam rivos, pueri, sat prata biberunt.

"Stop the currents, young men, the meadows have drunk sufficiently;" that is, Let your music cease, our ears have been sufficiently delighted. Allegory in paint. and sculpt., a figurative representation in which something else is intended than what is exhibited in the representation. It may be of three kinds, physical, moral, or historical.

ALLEGRET'TO, [from allegro,] denotes, in music, a movement or time quicker than andante, but not so quick as allegro.

ALLE'GRO. [It. merry, cheerful; It. leggiére; Sp. ligero; Fr. leger, light, nimble. See LIGHT.] In music, a word denoting a brisk movement; a sprightly part or strain; the quickest except presto. Piu allegro is a still quicker movement.

ALLELU'IAH, n. [Heb. הללויה, aleloo-eeay, Praise to Jah.] Praise Jehovah; a word used to denote pious joy and exultation, chiefly in hymns and anthems. The Greeks retained the word in their Ελελευ Ιω, Praise to Io; probably a corruption of Jah. The Romans retained the latter word in their Io triumphe.

ALLEMAND', n. A slow air in common time, or grave, solemn music, with a slow movement. Also a brisk dance, or a figure in dancing.

ALLEMAN'NIC, a. Belonging to the Alemanni, ancient Germans, and to Alemannia, their country. The word is generally supposed to be composed of all and manni, all men. Cluver. p. 68. This is probably an error. The word is more probably composed of the Celtic all, other, the root of Latin alius and man, place; one of another place, a stranger. The Welsh allman, is thus rendered, and this seems to be the original word. The name Alemanni, seems to have been first given to the Germans who invaded Gaul in the reign of Augustus.

ALLEN'ARLY, adv. Only, merely. A technical word of some importance in Scotch conveyancing. Thus, where lands are conveyed to a father, "for his liferent use allenarly," the force of the expression is, that the father's right is restricted to a mere liferent, or, at best, to a fiduciary fee, even in circumstances where, but for the word "allenarly," the father would have been unlimited fiar.

Allerion.

ALLE'RION, n. In her., an eagle without beak or feet, with expanded wings; denoting Imperialists vanquished and disarmed.

ALLEVEUR, n. A small Swedish coin, value about a halfpenny.

ALLE'VIATE. v. t. [Low L. allevio; ad and levo, to raise, levis, light; Fr. lever; Sp. llevar, to carry, levantar, to raise, and levante, a rising, and the eastern coasts of the Mediterranean, the east, so called from the rising of the sun, like oriental, from orior, to rise; Sax. hlifian, to be eminent. See LIFT.] 1. To make light; but always in a figurative sense, as it is not applied to material objects. To remove in part; to lessen, mitigate, or make easier to be endured; applied to evils; as, to alleviate sorrow, pain, care, punishment, a burden, &c.: opposed to aggravate.—2. To make less by representation; to lessen the magnitude or criminality; to extenuate; applied to moral conduct; as, to alleviate an offence. [This sense of the word is rare.]

ALLE'VIATED, pp. Made lighter; mitigated; eased; extenuated.

ALLE'VIATING, ppr. Making lighter, or more tolerable; extenuating.

ALLEVIA'TION, n. The act of lightening, allaying, or extenuating; a lessening, or mitigation.—2. That which lessens, mitigates, or makes more tolerable; as, the sympathy of a friend is an alleviation of grief.

I have not wanted such alleviations of life, as friendship could supply. (Dr. Johnson's letter to Mr. Hector.) Boswell.

This use of alleviation is hardly legitimate without supplying some word expressing evil, as trouble, sorrow, &c.—Without such alleviations of the cares or troubles of life.

ALLE'VIATIVE,† n. That which mitigates.

AL'LEY, n. (al'ly). [Fr. allée, a passage, from aller to go; Ir. alladh. Literally, a passing or going.] 1. A walk in a garden; a narrow passage.—2. A narrow passage or way in a city, as distinct from a public street.—3. A place in London where stocks are bought and sold. In perspective, that which, in order to have a greater appearance of length, is made wider at the entrance than at the termination.

ALLIA'CEOUS, a. [L. allium, garlic.] Pertaining to allium, or garlic; having the properties of garlic.

ALLIA'CEOUS PLANTS, n. Plants which partake more or less of the qualities of garlic or onions; such as onions, shallots, rocambole, chives, leeks, garlic, &c.

ALLI'ANCE, n. [Fr. alliance, from allier, lier, to tie or unite, from L. ligo; Gr. λυγοω: from the same root as liege, league, allegiance.] 1. The relation or union between families, contracted by marriage.—2. The union between nations, contracted by compact, treaty, or league.—3. The treaty, league, or compact, which is the instrument of confederacy; sometimes perhaps the act of confederating.—4. Any union or connection of interests between persons, families, states, or corporations; as, an alliance between church and state.—5. The persons or parties allied; as men or states may secure any alliances in their power.

ALLI'ANT,† n. An ally.

ALLI''CIENCY, n. [Lat. allicio, ad and lacio; L. allecto, elicio.] The power of attracting any thing; attraction; magnetism. [Lit. us.]

ALLI''CIENT,† n. That which attracts.

ALLI'ED, pp. Connected by marriage, treaty, or similitude. [See ALLY.]

AL'LIGATE, v. t. [L. alligo, ad and ligo, to bind. See ALLEGIANCE, LIEGE, LEAGUE.] To tie together; to unite by some tie.

AL'LIGATING, ppr. Tying together; uniting by some tie.

ALLIGA'TION, n. The act of tying together; the state of being tied. [Lit. us.] 2. A rule of arithmetic for finding the price or value of compounds, consisting of ingredients of different values. Thus if a quantity of sugar, worth eight pence the pound, and another quantity worth ten pence, are mixed, the question to be solved by alligation is, what is the value of the mixture by the pound. Alligation is of two kinds, medial and alternate; medial, when the rate of a mixture is sought from the rates and quantities of the simples; alternate, when the quantities of the simples are sought from the rates of the simples, and the rate of the mixture. In modern systems of arithmetic, however, this rule seldom has a place, as the operations regarding the mixture of different ingredients are more expeditiously performed by algebraic equations.

ALLIGA'TOR, n. [Properly allagarto, from the Spanish and Portuguese lagarto, a lizard; L. lacerta. The Latin word seems to be connected with lacertus, the arm; and the animal may be named from the resemblance of his legs to arms.] The American crocodile.

Alligator.

This animal has a long naked body, four feet, with five toes on the fore feet and four on the hind, armed with claws, and a serrated tail. The mouth is very large, and furnished with sharp teeth; the skin is brown, tough, and, on the sides, covered with tubercles. The largest of these animals grow to the length of seventeen or eighteen feet. They live in and about the rivers in warm climates, eat fish, and sometimes catch hogs on the shore, or dogs which are swimming. In winter, they burrow in the earth, which they enter under water and work upward, lying torpid till spring. The female lays a great number of eggs, which are deposited in the sand, and left to be hatched by the heat of the sun. According to its modern acceptation among zoologists, however, the name is no longer confined to the species most commonly found in Carolina, Louisiana, and the other southern states of the union; but it is applied generically to all the other American species, which agree with it in its most prominent and influential characters, and which have been called caymans, jacarés, &c., by the Spaniards, Portuguese, and Indians, of South America.

ALLIGA'TOR-PEAR, n. A West Indian fruit, resembling a pear in shape, from one to two pounds in weight. It is called also the avocado pear, and is the fruit of persea gratissima. It contains within its rind a yellow butyraceous substance, which, when the fruit is perfectly ripe, constitutes an agreeable food.

ALLIG'ATURE, n. See LIGATURE, which is the word in use.

ALLINEMENT, n. [Fr. alignement, a row, a squaring, from ligne, line; L. linea.] A reducing to a line or to a square; a state of being in squares, in a line, or on a level; a line; a row.

AL'LIOTH, n. A star in the tail of the great Bear, much used for finding the latitude at sea.

ALLIS'ION, n. (allizh'un). [L. allido, to dash or strike against, of ad and lædo, to hurt by striking. Lædo forms its participle læsus.] A striking against; as, the allision of the sea against the shore.

ALLITERA'TION, n. [L. ad and litera, a letter.] The repetition of the same letter at the beginning of two or more words immediately succeeding each other, or at short intervals; as, f and g in the following line:

Fields ever fresh, and groves for ever green.

ALLIT'ERATIVE, a. Pertaining to, or consisting in, alliteration.

AL'LIUM, n. Garlic; a genus of plants of the class Hexandria, and order Monogynia, and belonging to the natural order Asphodeleæ. To this genus belong the onion, leek, garlic, chive, and shallot.

ALLOCATE, v. t. To place; to set apart; to allot or give to each his share.

ALLOCA'TION, n. [L. ad and locatio, a placing, from locus, place. See LOCAL.] The act of putting one thing to another; hence, its usual sense is the admission of an article of account, or an allowance made upon an account; a term used in the English Exchequer. [See ALLOW.]

AL'LOCHROITE, n. An amorphous, massive, opaque mineral of a grayish, yellowish, or reddish colour, found in Norway; considered as a variety of garnet. Its name is said to be given to it, as expressive of its changes of colour before the blowpipe; Gr. αλλος, other, and χροα, colour.

ALLOCU'TION, n. [L. allocutio, of ad and loquor, to speak. See ELOQUENCE.] 1. The act or manner of speaking to, or of addressing in words.—2. An address; a formal address; as, of a general to his troops; a Roman term, rarely used in English.

ALLO'DIAL, a. Pertaining to allodium; freehold; free of rent or service; held independent of a lord paramount; opposed to feudal.

ALLO'DIAN is sometimes used, but is not well authorised.

ALLO'DIUM, n. [Fr. alleu, contr. word. According to O'Brien in his Focaloir, or Dictionary of the Irish, this word is the Celtic allod, ancient. According to Pontoppidan, it is composed of all and odh, all-property, or whole estate. In Sw. odal, and in Dan. odel, signify allodial; the word being used as an adjective; Sw. odalgods, that is, odal goods, signifies allodial lands; and odaljord, odal earth, is used as its synonym. Odalman, is one who possesses allodial land; odalbonde, is a yeoman or freeholder; odelt signifies undivided; o in Swedish being a prefix, answering to the English un, and giving to words a negative signification. If o in odal is this prefix, and dal from the root of deal, the word signifies undivided. But some obscurity rests on this word. Pontoppidan's derivation is most probably the true one.] Freehold estate; land which is the absolute property of the owner; real estate held in absolute independence, without being subject to any rent, service, or acknowledgment to a superior. It is thus opposed to feud. In England, there is no allodial land, all land being held of the king; but in the United States, most lands are allodial.

ALLONGE, n. (allunj'). [Fr. allonger, to lengthen, to thrust, allongé, lengthened, of ad and long.] 1. A pass with a sword; a thrust made by stepping forward and extending the arm; a term used in fencing, often contracted into lunge.—2. A long rein, when a horse is trotted in the hand.

ALLOO', v. t. or i. To incite dogs by a call. [See the correct word, HALLOO.]

ALLOPATHET'IC, or ALLOP'ATHIC, a. Pertaining to allopathy.

ALLOPATHET'ICALLY, adv. In a manner conformable to allopathy.

ALLOP'ATHIST, n. One who practises medicine, according to the principles and rules of allopathy.

ALLOP'ATHY, n. [αλλος, other, and παθος, morbid condition.] That method of medical practice in which there is an attempt to cure disease by the production of a condition of the system, either different from, opposite to, or incompatible with the condition essential to the disease to be cured. It is opposed to homœopathy.

AL'LOPHANE, n. [Gr. αλλος, other, and φαινω, to appear.] A mineral of a blue, and sometimes of a green or brown colour, which occurs massive, or in imitative shapes. It gelatinizes in acids. Allophane is a variety of clay, occurring in amorphous, botryoidal or reniform masses.

AL'LOQUY, n. [L. ad and loquor.] A speaking to another.

ALLOT', v. t. [of ad and lot; Sax. hlot. See LOT.] 1. To divide or distribute by lot.—2. To distribute, or parcel out in parts or portions; or to distribute a share to each individual concerned.—3. To grant, as a portion; to give, assign, or appoint in general; as, let every man be contented with that which providence allots to him.

ALLOT'MENT, n. That which is allotted; a share, part, or portion granted or distributed; that which is assigned by lot, or by the act of God.—2. A part, portion, or place appropriated.

In a field, there is an allotment for olives. Broome.

Allotment of goods, in commerce, is the dividing a ship's cargo into several parts, which are to be purchased by several persons; each person's share being assigned by lot. Allotment of land, such portions of ground as are granted to claimants on the division and inclosure of commons and waste lands.

ALLOT'TED, pp. Distributed by lot; granted; assigned.

ALLOT'TERY is used by Shakspeare for Allotment; but is not authorised by usage.

ALLOT'TING, ppr. Distributing by lot; giving as portions; assigning.

ALLOW', v. t. [Fr. allouer, from louer; L. loco, to lay, set, place; W. llogi. See LAY.] 1. To grant, give, or yield; as, to allow a servant his liberty; to allow a pension.—2. To admit; as, to allow the truth of a proposition; to allow a claim.—3. To admit; to own or acknowledge; as, to allow the right of the king to dismiss his ministers.—4. To approve, justify, or sanction.

Ye allow the deeds of your fathers; Luke xi; Rom. vii.

5. To afford, or grant as a compensation; as, to allow a dollar a day for wages.—6. To abate or deduct; as, to allow a sum for tare or leakage.—7. To permit; to grant license to; as, to allow a son to be absent.

ALLOW'ABLE, a. That may be permitted as lawful, or admitted as true and proper; not forbid; not unlawful or improper; as, a certain degree of freedom is allowable among friends.

ALLOW'ABLENESS, n. The quality of being allowable; lawfulness; exemption from prohibition or impropriety.

ALLOW'ABLY, adv. In an allowable manner; with propriety.

ALLOW'ANCE, n. The act of allowing or admitting.—2. Permission; license; approbation; sanction; usually slight approbation.—3. Admission; assent to a fact or state of things; a granting.—4. Freedom from restraint; indulgence.—5. That which is allowed; a portion appointed; a stated quantity, as of food or drink; hence, in seaman's lan., a limited quantity of meat and drink, when provisions fall short.—6. Abatement; deduction; as, to make an allowance for the inexperience of youth.—7.† Established character; reputation; as, a pilot of approved allowance.

Allowance in commerce, is a deduction from the gross weight of goods, agreed on between merchants, according to the customs of particular countries and ports, the chief of which deductions is known by the name of tare.

ALLOW'ANCE, v. t. To put upon allowance; to restrain or limit to a certain quantity of provisions or drink; as, distress compelled the captain of the ship to allowance his crew.

ALLOW'ED, pp. Granted; permitted; assented to; admitted; approved; indulged; appointed; abated.

ALLOW'ER, n. One who allows, permits, grants, or authorises.

ALLOW'ING, ppr. Granting; permitting; admitting; approving; indulging; deducting.

AL'LOXAN, n. One of the products of the decomposition of uric acid by nitric acid. When treated with alkalies, it produces alloxanic acid, the salts of which are termed alloxanates.

ALLOX'ANTINE, n. A substance obtained when alloxan is brought into contact with zinc and hydrochloric acid, with chloride of zinc, or sulphuretted hydrogen.

ALLOY', v. t. [Fr. allier, to unite or mix; L. alligo, ad and ligo, to bind; Gr. λυγόω; Sp. ligar, to tie or bind, to alloy or mix base metals with gold or silver, to league or confederate. We observe that alloy and league, alliance, ally, are from the same root.] 1. To reduce the purity of a metal, by mixing with it a portion of one less valuable; as, to alloy gold with silver, or silver with copper.—2. To mix metals.—3. To reduce or abate by mixture; as, to alloy pleasure with misfortunes.

ALLOY', n A baser metal mixed with a finer.—2. The mixture of different metals; any metallic compound; this is its common signification in chemistry. Alloys of metallic substances are either natural or artificial; but those which are artificial, are by far the most important. Every alloy is distinguished by the metal which predominates in its composition, or which gives it its value. When mercury is one of the component parts, the alloy is called an amalgam.—3. Evil mixed with good; as, no happiness is without alloy.

ALLOY'AGE, n [Fr. alliage, from allier.] 1. The act of alloying metals, or the mixture of a baser metal with a finer, to reduce its purity; the act of mixing metals.—2. The mixture of different metals.

ALLOY'ED, pp. Mixed; reduced in purity; debased; abated by foreign mixture.

ALLOY'ING, ppr. Mixing a baser metal with a finer, to reduce its purity; abating by foreign mixture.

ALL'SPICE. See under the compounds of ALL.

ALLUDE, v. i. [L. alludo, to smile upon or make sport with, of ad and ludo, to play.] To refer to something not directly mentioned; to have reference; to hint at by remote suggestions; as, that story alludes to a recent transaction.

ALLŪDING, ppr. Having reference; hinting at.

ALLUMEE', In her., a term applied to the eyes of a bear or other beast, when they are drawn red and sparkling.

ALLU'MINOR, n. [Fr. allumer, to light. See LIMNER.] One who colours or paints upon paper or parchment, giving light and ornament to letters and figures. This is now written limner.

ALLŪRE, v. t. [Fr. leurrer, to decoy, from leurre, a lure.] To attempt to draw to; to tempt by the offer of some good, real or apparent; to invite by something flattering or acceptable; as, rewards allure men to brave danger. Sometimes used in a bad sense, to allure to evil; but in this sense entice is more common. In Hosea ii. 14, allure is used in its genuine sense; in 2 Peter ii. 18, in the sense of entice.

ALLŪRED, pp. Tempted; drawn, or invited, by something that appears desirable.

AL'LŪREMENT, n. That which allures; any real or apparent good held forth, or operating, as a motive to action; temptation; enticement; as, the allurements of pleasure, or of honour.

ALLŪRER, n. He, or that, which allures.

ALLŪRING, ppr. Drawing; tempting; inviting by some real or apparent good.—2. a. Inviting; having the quality of attracting or tempting.

ALLŪRINGLY, adv. In an alluring manner; enticingly.

ALLŪRINGNESS, n. The quality of alluring or tempting by the prospect of some good. [Rarely used.]

ALLU'SION, n. (allu'zhun). [Fr. from allusio, Low L. See ALLUDE.] A reference to something not explicitly mentioned; a hint; a suggestion, by which something is applied or understood to belong to that which is not mentioned, by means of some similitude which is perceived between them.

ALLU'SIVE, a. Having reference to something not fully expressed.

ALLU'SIVELY, adv. By way of allusion; by implication, remote suggestion or insinuation.

ALLU'SIVENESS, n. The quality of being allusive. [Rarely used.]

ALLU'SORY, a. Allusive.

ALLU'VIAL, a. [See ALLUVION.] 1. Pertaining to alluvion; added to land by the wash of water.—2. Washed ashore or down a stream; formed by a current of water; as alluvial ores; alluvial soil. Alluvial formations in geol., are recent deposits in valleys or in plains, of the detritus of the neighbouring mountains. Gravel, loam, clay, sand, brown coal, wood coal, bog iron ore, and calc tuff, compose the alluvial deposits.

ALLU'VIO, n. In Scotch law, the addition which a river running between the grounds of different heritors may insensibly make to one of the properties, and which belongs to the owner of the ground to which the addition is made. In the case of a violent flood, however, this does not hold.

ALLU'VION, } n. [L. alluvio, of ad and ALLU'VIUM, } lavo or luo, alluo, to wash. See LAVE.] 1. The insensible increase of earth on a shore, or bank of a river, by the force of water, as by a current or by waves. The owner of the land thus augmented has a right to the alluvial earth.—2. A gradual washing or carrying of earth or other substances to a shore or bank; the earth thus added.—3. The mass of substances collected by means of the action of water, such as are found in valleys and plains, consisting of gravel, loam, clay, or other earths, washed down from the mountains. Great alterations in the limits of countries are produced by alluvial deposits, along the sea-shores, the banks of rivers, or at their mouths. Alluvion has been divided into modern and ancient. The modern is characterised by the remains of man and contemporaneous animals and plants; the ancient, by an immense proportion of large mammalia and carnivora, both of extinct and recent genera and species.

ALLU'VIOUS, a. The same as alluvial, and less frequently used.

ALLY', v. t. [Fr. allier; reciprocal verb, s'allier, to match or confederate; from ad and lier, to tie or unite; L. ligo.] 1. To unite, or form a relation; as, between families by marriage, or between princes and states by treaty, league, or confederacy.—2. To form a relation by similitude, resemblance, or friendship. Note. This word is more generally used in the passive form; as, families are allied by blood; or reciprocally, as, princes ally themselves to powerful states.

ALLY′, n. A prince or state united by treaty or league; a confederate.

The allies of Rome were slaves. Ames.

2. One related by marriage or other tie; but seldom applied to individuals, except to princes in their public capacity.

ALLY′ING, ppr. Uniting by marriage or treaty.

AL′MACANTAR, n. See ALMUCANTAR.

AL′MADIE, n. A bark canoe used by the Africans; also a long boat used at Calicut, in India, eighty feet long, and six or seven broad; called also cathuri.

AL′MAGEST, n. [al and μεγιστος, greatest.] A book or collection of problems in astronomy and geometry, drawn up by Ptolemy. The same title has been given to other works of the like kind.

ALMA′GRA, n. A fine deep red ochre, with an admixture of purple, very heavy, dense but friable, with a rough dusty surface. It is the sil atticum of the ancients. It is austere to the taste, astringent, melting in the mouth and staining the skin. It is used as a paint and as a medicine.

ALMA MATER. [L. Benign mother, fostering mother.] An epithet applied to Oxford, Cambridge, and other universities, by those who imbibe, or have imbibed, the milk of learning from such universities. This custom has been transplanted to the United States of America.

AL′MANAC, or ALMANACK, n. [Ar. al and manach, manach, a calendar or diary.] A small book or table, containing a calendar of days, weeks, and months, with the times of the rising of the sun and moon, changes of the moon, eclipses, hours of full tide, stated festivals of churches, stated terms of courts, observations on the weather, &c., for the year ensuing. This calendar is sometimes published on one side of a single sheet, and called a sheet-almanac. The Baltic nations formerly engraved their calendars on pieces of wood, on swords, helves of axes, and various other utensils, and especially on walking-sticks. Many of these are preserved in the cabinets of the curious. They are called by different nations, rimstocks, primstaries, runstocks, runstaffs, clogs, &c. The characters used are generally the Runic or Gothic. The agricultural, political, and statistical information, which is usually contained in popular almanacs, though as valuable a part of the work as any, is comparatively of modern date. Nautical almanac, a kind of national almanac published annually, but two or three years in advance, under the direction of the commissioners of longitude. It contains, among other things, the distances of the moon from the sun and fixed stars, for every three hours of apparent time, adapted to the meridian of Greenwich; by comparing which with the distances carefully observed at sea, the mariner may readily infer his longitude to a degree of exactness that is found sufficient for most nautical purposes.

AL′MANAC-MAKER, n. A maker of almanacs.

ALMAN′DIN, n. [Fr. and It.] In mineral., precious garnet, a beautiful mineral of a red colour, of various shades, sometimes tinged with yellow or blue. It is commonly translucent, sometimes transparent. It occurs crystallised in the rhombic dodecahedron.

AL′ME, or AL′MA, n. Girls in Egypt, whose occupation is to amuse company with singing and dancing.

ALME′NA, n. A weight of two pounds, used to weigh saffron in several parts of Asia.

ALMIGHTINESS, n. Omnipotence; infinite or boundless power; an attribute of God only.

ALMIGHTY, a. [all and mighty. See MIGHT.] Possessing all power; omnipotent; being of unlimited might; being of boundless sufficiency; appropriately applied to the Supreme Being.

ALMIGHTY, n. The Omnipotent God.

AL′MOND, n. [Fr. amande; It. mandola.] 1. The fruit of the amygdalus communis, or almond tree. An ovate compressed nut perforated in the pores. The part used is the kernel. There are two varieties, one sweet, and the other bitter. From the pressed kernels almond oil is produced. [It is popularly pronounced ammond.]—2. The tonsils, two glands, near the basis of the tongue, are called almonds, from their resemblance to that nut; vulgarly, but improperly, called the almonds of the ears, as they belong to the throat.—3. In Portugal, a measure by which wine is sold, twenty-six of which make a pipe. [But in Portuguese it is written almude.] —4. Among lapidaries, almonds signify pieces of rock crystal, used in adorning branch candlesticks, so called from their resemblance to this fruit.

AL′MOND-FURNACE, among refiners, is a furnace in which the slags of litharge, left in refining silver, are reduced to lead, by the help of charcoal; that is, according to modern chemistry, in which the oxide of lead is deoxidized, and the metal revived.

AL′MOND-TREE, n. A species of Amygdalus (A communis). The tree which produces the almond. The leaves and flowers resemble those of the peach, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged. The almond-tree is only grown in this country for the sake of its beautiful vernal flowers, being incapable of ripening its fruit in this climate, even in the south of England, except in unusually hot summers, preceded by mild and uninterrupted springs.

AL′MOND-WILLOW n. The salix amygdalina, Linn., a species of willow the leaves of which resemble those of the almond tree.

AL′MONER, n. [See ALMS.] An officer whose duty is to distribute charity or alms. By the ancient canons, every monastery was to dispose of a tenth of its income in alms to the poor, and all bishops were obliged to keep an almoner. This title is sometimes given to a chaplain; as, the almoner of a ship or regiment. The lord almoner, or lord high almoner, in England, an ecclesiastical officer, generally a bishop, had the forfeiture of all deodands, and the goods of self-murderers, which he had to distribute to the poor. The grand almoner, in France, once the first ecclesiastical dignitary, had the superintendence of hospitals.

AL′MONRY, n. [Corrupted into ambry, aumbry, or aumery.] The place where the almoner resides, or where the alms are distributed.

ALMOST, adv [all and most. The Saxon order of writing was thus; "all most who were present." Sax. Chron. p. 225. We now use a duplication, almost all who were present.] Nearly; well nigh; for the greatest part.

Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian; Acts xxvi.

ÄLMS, n. (ämz). [Sax. almes; old Eng. almesse; Norm. almoignes; Fr. aumônes; L. eleemosyna; Gr. ελεημοσυνη. The first syllables appear to be from ελεω, to pity.] Any thing given gratuitously to relieve the poor, as money, food or clothing, otherwise called charity.

A lame man was laid daily to ask an alms; Acts iii.

Cornelius gave much alms to the people; Acts x.

Tenure by free alms, or frank-almoign, in England, is that by which the possessor is bound to pray for the soul of the donor, whether dead or alive; a tenure by which most of the ancient monasteries and religious houses in England held their lands, as do the parochial clergy, and many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary establishments at this day. Land thus held was free from all rent or other service.

ÄLMS-BASKET; ÄLMS-BOX; ÄLMS-CHEST. Vessels appropriated to receive alms.

ÄLMS-DEED, n. An act of charity; a charitable gift.

ÄLMS-FOLK,† n. Persons supporting others by alms.

ÄLMS-GIVER, n. One who gives to the poor.

ÄLMS-GIVING, n. The bestowment of charity.

ÄLMS-HOUSE, n. A house appropriated for the use of the poor, who are supported by the public.

ÄLMS-MEN, } n. Persons support-
ÄLMS-PEOPLE, } ed by charity or by public provision.

AL′MUCANTAR, n. [Arabic.] A series of circles of the sphere passing through the centre of the sun, or of a star, parallel to the horizon. It is synonymous with a parallel of altitude, whose common zenith is the vertical point.

AL′MUCANTAR'S STAFF. An instrument of box or pear-tree, having an arch of fifteen degrees, used to take observations of the sun, about the time of its rising or setting, to find the amplitude and the variations of the compass.

ALMUDE, n. A wine measure in Portugal, of which twenty-six make a pipe.

AL'MUG, } n. In Scripture, a tree or
AL'GUM, } wood about which the learned are not agreed. The most probable conjecture is, that the word denotes gummy or resinous wood in general. The Vulgate translates it ligna thyina, and the Septuagint, wrought-wood; others, ebony, brazil, or pine, and the Rabbins render it coral. It was used for musical instruments, staircases, &c. The thyinum is the citron tree, from Mauritania, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty. The almug, almugim, or algumim, or simply gummim, is most probably a gummy wood, and perhaps may be the shittim, often mentioned in Scripture. See 1 Kings x. 11.

AL'NAGE, n. [Fr. aulnage, now softened into aunage; L. ulna; Gr. ωλενη, an arm, a cubit; W. elin; Ir. uelen, uile, or uilean, an elbow, a nook, or corner. See ELL.] A measuring by the ell.

AL'NAGER, or AL'NAGAR, n. A measurer by the ell; a sworn officer, whose duty was to inspect and measure woollen cloth, and fix upon it a seal. This office was abolished by statute 11 and 12 Will. III. No duty or office of this kind exists in the United States.

AL'NIGHT, n. A cake of wax with the wick in the midst.

ALNUS. See ALDER.

AL'OE, n. (al'o) [L. aloë; Gr. αλοη; Heb. plur. אהלים, achleem, aloe-trees.] A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Asphodeleæ, and included under Hexandria Monogynia of Linnæus. There are several species, all of them natives of warm climates, and most of them of the southern part of Africa. Among the Mohammedans, the aloe is a symbolic plant, especially in Egypt; and every one who returns from a pilgrimage to Mecca, hangs it over his street door, as a token that he has performed the journey. In Africa, the leaves of the Guinea aloe are made into durable ropes. Of one species are made fishing-lines, bow-strings, stockings, and hammocks. The leaves of another species hold rain water. A. socotrina yields the well-known medicine of the same name, but the greater number of the species are mere objects of curiosity.

ALOERESI'NIC ACID. See POLYCHROMIC ACID.

AL'OES, in med., is the inspissated juice of the aloe. The juice is collected from the leaves, which are cut and put in a tub, and when a large quantity is procured, it is boiled to a suitable consistence; or it is exposed to the sun till all the fluid part is exhaled. There are several kinds sold in the shops; as, the Socotrine aloes from Socotora, an isle in the Indian ocean; the hepatic or common Barbadoes aloes; and the fetid or caballine aloes. Aloes is a stimulating stomachic purgative; when taken in small doses, it is useful for people of a lax habit and sedentary life.

AL'OES-WOOD, n. See AGALLOCHUM.

ALOET'IC, } a. Pertaining to aloe
ALOET'ICAL, } or aloes; partaking of the qualities of aloes.

ALOET'IC, n. A medicine consisting chiefly of aloes.

ALOETIC ACID, n. An acid obtained by action of nitric acid, of sp. gr. 1.25 upon aloes.

ALOFT', adv. [a and loft. See LOFT and LUFF.] 1. On high; in the air; high above the ground; as, the eagle soars aloft.—2. In seamen's lan., in the top; at the mast-head; or on the higher yards or rigging. Hence on the upper part, as of a building.

ALO'GIANS, n. [α neg. and λογος, word.] In Church his., a sect of ancient heretics, who denied Jesus Christ to be the Logos, and consequently rejected the Gospel of St. John.

AL'OGOTROPHY, n. [Gr. αλογος, unreasonable, and τροφη, nutrition.] A disproportionate nutrition of the parts of the body, as when one part receives more or less nourishment and growth than another.

AL'OMANCY, n. [Gr. αλς, salt, and μαντεια, divination.] Divination by salt.

AL'OGY, n. [Gr. α and λογος.] Unreasonableness; absurdity.

ALONE, a. [all and one; Germ. allein; Dan. allene, Scot. alane.] 1. Single; solitary; without the presence of another; applied to a person or thing.

It is not good that man should be alone; Gen. ii.

2. It is applied to two or more persons or things, when separate from others, in a place or condition by themselves; without company.

And when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples; Mark iv.

3. Only.

Thou whose name alone is Jehovah; Ps. lxxxiii.

This sense at first appears to be adverbial, but really is not; whose name single, solitary, without another, is Jehovah. To let alone is to suffer to rest; to forbear molesting or meddling with; to suffer to remain in its present state. Alone, in this phrase, is an adjective, the word to which it refers being omitted; let me alone; let them alone; let it alone; that is, suffer it to be unmolested, or to remain as it is, or let it remain by itself.

ALONE, adv. Separately; by itself.

ALONELY,† a. or adv. Only; merely; singly.

ALONENESS,† n. That state which belongs to no other.

ALONG', adv. [Sax. and-lang or ond-lang; Fr. au long, le long. See LONG. The Saxons always prefixed and or ond, and the sense seems to be, by the length, or opposite the length, or in the direction of the length.] 1. By the length; lengthwise; in a line with the length; as, the troops marched along the bank of the river, or along the highway; 1 Sam. vi.—2. Onward; in a line, or with a progressive motion; as, a meteor glides along the sky; let us walk along. All along signifies the whole length; through the whole distance; in the whole way or length.

Ishmael went forth, weeping all along as he went; Jer. xli.; 1 Sam. xxviii.

Along with signifies in company; joined with; as, go along with us. Sometimes with is omitted.

Come then, my friend, my genius, come along. Pope.

Along side, in seamen's lan., that is, by the length or in a line with the side, signifies side by side, as by another ship, or by the side of a wharf. Along shore, is by the shore or coast, lengthwise, and near the shore. Lying along, is lying on the side, or pressed down by the weight of sail.

ALONGST',† adv. Along; through or by the length.

ALOOF', adv. [All off. Perhaps from aloft.] 1. At a distance, but within view, or at a small distance, in a literal sense; as, to stand aloof.—2. In a figurative sense, not concerned in a design; declining to take any share, implying circumspection; keeping at a distance from the point, or matter in debate.

ALOOF'NESS, n. The keeping at a distance.

AL'OPECY, n. [Gr. αλωπηξ, a fox, whose urine is said to occasion baldness.] A disease called the fox-evil or scurf, which is a falling off of the hair, not only from the scalp but from the beard and eye-brows. In modern medical lan., the term has been loosely applied to any kind of baldness.

ALO'SA, n. A fish of passage, called the shad, or mother of herrings, a species of Clupea. It is an abdominal, and some naturalists allege it to be a different species from the shad.

ALOU'CHI, n. A sweet scented gum, which runs from the tree which produces white cinnamon.

ALOUD', adv. [a and loud; Sax. gehlyd, clamour. See LOUD.] Loudly; with a loud voice, or great noise.

Cry aloud, spare not; Isa. lviii.

ALOW, adv. In a low place, or a lower part; opposed to aloft.

ALP, ALPS, n. [Qu. Gr. αλφος, white; L. albus. The Celts called all high mountains alpes or olbe. Cluver. Thucydides mentions a castle, in the territory of Argos, situated on a hill, and called Olpas or Olp. Lib. 3, Ca. 105. Pelloutier, Hist. des Celtes, Liv. 1. 15. The derivation of the word from αλφος white, is therefore doubtful. In Ir. or Gaelic, ailp is a huge mass or lump.] A high mountain. The name, it is supposed, was originally given to mountains whose tops were covered with snow, and hence appropriately applied to the mountains of Switzerland; so that by Alps is generally understood the latter mountains. But geographers apply the name to any high mountains.

ALPAG'NA, n. An animal of Peru, used as a beast of burden; the Camelus Paco of Linnæus, and the Pacos of Pennant.

AL'PHA, n. [Heb. אלף, alooph, an ox or leader.] The first letter in the Greek alphabet, answering to A, and used to denote first or beginning.

I am Alpha and Omega; Rev. i.

As a numeral it stands for one. It was formerly used also to denote chief; as, Plato was the Alpha of the wits.

AL'PHABET, n. [Gr. αλφα and βητα, A and B.] The letters of a language arranged in the customary order, the series of letters which form the elements of speech. The English alphabet has 26 letters, the French 23, the Heb. Chal. Syr. and Samar. 22 each; the Arab. 28, the Pers. 31, the Turk. 33, Georg. 36, Copt, 32, Muscov. 43, Gr. 24, Lat. 22, Sclav. 27, Dutch 26, Span. 25, It. 20; the Ethiopic has no fewer than 202 letters; the Chinese have no alphabet, but have characters, which are the signs not of words, but of ideas, and are in number about 80,000.

AL'PHABET, v. t. To arrange in the order of an alphabet; to form an alphabet in a book, or designate the leaves by the letters of the alphabet.

ALPHABETA'RIAN, n. A learner while in the A B C.

ALPHABET'IC, ALPHABET'ICAL, a. In the order of an alphabet, or in the order of the letters as customarily arranged.

ALPHABET'ICALLY, adv. In an alphabetical manner; in the customary order of the letters.

ALPHE'NIX, n. [al and phœnix.] White barley sugar, used for colds. It is common sugar boiled till it will easily crack; then poured upon an oiled marble table, and moulded into various figures.

AL'PHEST, n. A small fish, having a purple back and belly, with yellow sides, a smooth mouth, and thick fleshy lips; always caught near the shore or among rocks. Labrus Cinædus, Linn.

ALPHON'SIN, n. A surgical instrument for extracting bullets from wounds, so called from its inventor, Alphonsus Ferrier of Naples. It consists of three branches, which close by a ring, and open when it is drawn back.

ALPHON'SIN TABLES, n. Astronomical tables made by Alphonsus, king of Arragon.

AL'PHUS, n. [Gr. ἀλφός, white.] That species of leprosy called vitiligo, in which the skin is rough with white spots.

AL'PINE, a. [L. alpinus, from Alpes.] 1. Pertaining to the Alps, or to any lofty mountain; very high; elevated. —2. Growing on high mountains; as, alpine plants.

AL'PINE, n. A kind of strawberry growing on lofty hills.

AL'PIST, or AL'PIA, n. The seed of the fox-tail; a small seed used for feeding birds.

AL'QUIER, n. A measure in Portugal for dry things, as well as liquids, containing half an almude, or about two gallons. It is called also Cantar.

AL'QUIFOU, n. A sort of lead ore, which, when broken, looks like antimony. It is found in Cornwall, England; used by potters to give a green varnish to their wares, and called potter's ore. A small mixture of manganese gives it a blackish hue.

AL'READ'Y, adv. (alred'dy.) [all and ready. See READY.] Literally, a state of complete preparation; but, by an easy deflection, the sense is, at this time, or at a specified time.

Elias is come already; Mat. xvii.

Joseph was in Egypt already; Exod. i.

It has reference to past time, but may be used for a future past; as, when you shall arrive the business will be already completed, or will have been completed already.

AL'SO, adv. [all and so. Sax. eal and swa; eal, all, the whole, and swa, so.] Likewise; in like manner.

Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also; Mat. vi.

ALT, or AL'TO, a. [It. from L. altus, high; Celt. alt, ailt, a high place; Heb. עלית, oleth, upper, על, ol, high.] In music, the highest natural adult male voice, or countertenor, the usual compass of which is from F the fourth line in the base, to C the third space on the treble; also the instrument called in England the tenor, and by the Italians the viola. Alto clef, a name of the C clef, when placed on the third line; more commonly in England, called the countertenor clef. Alto rilievo or high relief, a term which designates that kind of sculpture which is executed on a flat surface, but projects considerably above the ground or plane. The degree of projection given to Alto rilievo depends on the will of the sculptor; more than three fourths of the figure are frequently shown, and figures in basso rilievo, (low relief,) are sometimes added to express gradations of distance.

ALTAIC, or ALTA'IAN, a. [Tart. alatau, perhaps, al-tag, high mountain. Tooke 1, 121.] Pertaining to the Altai, a vast ridge of mountains extending, in an easterly direction, through a considerable part of Asia, and forming a boundary between the Russian and Chinese dominions.

AL'TAR, n. [L. altare, probably from the same root as altus, high; Celt. alt, a high place.] 1. A mount; a table or elevated place, on which sacrifices were anciently offered to some deity. Altars were originally made of turf, afterwards of stone, wood, or horn; some were round, others square, others triangular. They differed also in height, but all faced the east. The principal altars of the Jews were the altar of incense, of burnt-offerings, and of showbread; all of shittim-wood, and covered with gold or brass.—2. In modern churches, the communion table, and, figuratively, a church; a place of worship.—3. In scrip., Christ is called the altar of Christians, he being the atoning sacrifice for sin.

We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat, who serve tabernacles; Heb. xiii.

AL'TAR-CLOTH, n. A cloth to lay upon an altar in churches.

ALT'AR-FIRE, n. Fire on an altar.

AL'TAR-PIECE, n. A painting placed over the altar in a church.

AL'TAR-WISE, adv. Placed in the manner of an altar.

AL'TARAGE, n. The profits arising to priests from oblations, or on account of the altar. Also, in law, altars erected in virtue of donations, before the Reformation, within a parochial church, for the purpose of singing a mass for deceased friends. At the Reformation in Scotland, when altarages came to be suppressed, the founders were allowed to convert the endowments to the maintenance of bursars in one of the universities.

AL'TARIST, or AL'TAR-THANE, n. In old laws, an appellation given to the priest to whom the altarage belonged: also a chaplain.

AL'TER, v. t. [Fr. alterer; from L. alter, another. See ALIEN. Alter is supposed to be a contraction of ἀλλοτριος, alienus, of ἀλλος and ἑτερος.] 1. To make some change in; to make different in some particular; to vary in some degree, without an entire change.

My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that has gone out of my lips; Ps. lxxxix.

2. To change entirely or materially; as, to alter an opinion. In general, to alter is to change partially; to change is more generally to substitute one thing for another, or to make a material difference in a thing.

AL'TER, v. i. To become, in some respects, different; to vary; as, the weather alters almost daily.

The law which altereth not; Dan. vi.

ALTERABIL'ITY, n. The quality of being susceptible of alteration.

AL'TERABLE, a. That may become different; that may vary.

AL'TERABLENESS, n. The quality of admitting alteration; variableness.

AL'TERABLY, adv. In a manner that may be altered, or varied.

AL'TERAGE, n. [From alo, to feed.] The breeding, nourishing, or fostering of a child. But this is not an English word.

AL'TERANT, a. Altering; gradually changing.

AL'TERANT, n. A medicine which gradually corrects the state of the body, and changes it from a diseased to a healthy condition. An alterative.

ALTERA'TION, n. [L. alteratio.] The act of making different, or of varying in some particular; an altering or partial change; also the change made, or the loss or acquisition of qualities not essential to the form or nature of a thing. Thus a cold substance suffers an alteration when it becomes hot.

AL'TERATIVE, a. Causing alteration; having the power to alter.

AL'TERATIVE, n. A medicine which gradually induces a change in the habit or constitution, and restores healthy functions without producing any sensible evacuation by perspiration, purging, or vomiting. This word is more generally used than Alterant.

AL'TERCATE, v. i. [L. altercor, alterco, from alter, another.] To contend in words; to dispute with zeal, heat, or anger; to wrangle.

ALTERCA'TION, n. [L. altercatio.] Warm contention in words; dispute carried on with heat or anger; controversy; wrangle.

AL'TERN, a. [L. alternus, of alter, another.] 1. Acting by turns; one succeeding another; alternate, which is the word generally used.—2. In crystallography, exhibiting, on two parts, an upper and a lower part, faces which alternate among themselves, but which, when the two parts are compared, correspond with each other.

Altern-base, in trigonometry, is a term used in distinction from the true base. Thus in oblique triangles, the true base is the sum of the sides, and then the difference of the sides is the altern-base; or the true base is the difference of the sides, and then the sum of the sides is the altern-base.

AL'TERNACY, n. Performance or actions by turns. [Lit. us.]

ALTERN'AL, a. Alternative. [Lit. us.]

ALTERN'ALLY, adv. By turns. [Lit. us.]

ALTERN'ATE, a. [L. alternatus.] 1. Being by turns; one following the other in succession of time or place; hence reciprocal.

And bid alternate passions fall and rise. Pope

Alternate leaves.

2. In bot., branches and leaves are alternate, when they rise higher on opposite sides alternately, come out singly, and follow in gradual order.

Alternate alligation. See ALLIGATION.

Alternate angles, in geom., the internal angles made by a line cutting two parallels, and lying on opposite sides of the cutting line; the one below the first parallel, and the other above the second. Thus, if the parallels A B, C D, be cut by the line E F, the angles A G H, G H D, as also the angles B G H, and G H C, are called alternate angles.

Alternate angles.

In her., the first and fourth quarters, and the second and third, are usually of the same nature, and are called alternate quarters.

ALTERN'ATE, n. That which happens by turns with something else; vicissitude.

AL'TERNATE, v. t. [L. alterno. See ALTER. With the accent on the second syllable, the participle alternating can hardly be pronounced.] To perform by turns, or in succession; to cause to succeed by turns; to change one thing for another reciprocally; as, God alternates good and evil.

AL'TERNATE, v. i. To happen or to act by turns; as, the flood and ebb tides alternate with each other.—2. To follow reciprocally in place.

Different species alternating with each other. Kirwan.

ALTERN'ATELY, adv. In reciprocal succession; by turns, so that each is succeeded by that which it succeeds; as night follows day and day follows night.—In geom., and alg., a term used when there are four proportionals of the same kind, and it is inferred that the first is to the third as the second to the fourth. Thus, if a : b : : c : d (these quantities being of the same kind,) then alternately a : c : : b : d. Instead of alternately, the terms by alternation, or alternando are sometimes used.

ALTERN'ATENESS, n. The quality of being alternate, or of following in succession

AL'TERNATING, ppr. Performing or following by turns.

ALTERNA'TION, n. The reciprocal succession of things, in time or place; the act of following and being followed in succession; as, we observe the alternation of day and night, cold and heat, summer and winter. Alternation in geom., and alg. See ALTERNATELY.—2. The different changes or alterations of orders, in numbers. Thus, if it is required to know how many changes can be rung on six bells, multiply the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, continually into one another, and the last product is the number required. This is called permutation.—3. The answer of the congregation speaking alternately with the minister.—4. Alternate performance, in the choral sense.

ALTERN'ATIVE, a. [Fr. alternatif.] Offering a choice of two things.

ALTERN'ATIVE, n. That which may be chosen or omitted; a choice of two things, so that if one is taken, the other must be left. Thus, when two things offer a choice of one only, the two things are called alternatives. In strictness, then, the word cannot be applied to more than two things, and when one thing only is offered for choice, it is said there is no alternative.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. Cranch.

ALTERN'ATIVELY, adv. In the manner of alternatives, in a manner that admits the choice of one out of two things.

ALTERN'ATIVENESS, n. The quality or state of being alternative.

ALTERN'ITY, n. Succession by turns; alternation.

ALTHE'A, n. [Gr. αλθαια, from αλθω, or αλθαινω, to heal.] A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Malvaceæ. Althea rosea is the hollyhock, which is indigenous in China. The common marsh-mallow belongs to this genus, has a perennial root, and an annual stalk, rising four or five feet. It abounds with mucilage, and is used as an emollient.

ALTHEIN'E, n The name of a supposed new vegetable principle extracted from the roots of the marsh-mallow; but it has been shown to be identical with asparagin.

ALTHION'IC ACID, n. An acid derived from the residue of the preparation of olefiant gas, from alcohol and sulphuric acid. The salts which it forms with bases, are called althionates.

ALTHOUGH, (altho'). obs. verb, or used only in the imperative. [all and though; from Sax. thah or theah; Ir. daighim, to give. See THOUGH.] Grant all this; be it so; allow all; suppose that; admit all that; as, "although the fig-tree shall not blossom;" Hab. iii. That is, grant, admit, or suppose what follows—"the fig-tree shall not blossom." It is a transitive verb, and admits after it the definitive that—although that the fig-tree shall not blossom; but this use of the verb has been long obsolete. The word may be defined by notwithstanding, non obstante; as not opposing may be equivalent to admitting or supposing.

ALTIL'OQUENCE, n. [L. altus, high, and loquor, loquens, speaking.] Lofty speech; pompous language.

ALTIM'ETER, n. [L. altus, high, and Gr. μετρον, measure. See MEASURE and MODE.] An instrument for taking altitudes by geometrical principles, as a geometrical quadrant, square, or theodolite.

ALTIM'ETRY, n. The art of ascertaining altitudes by means of a proper instrument, and by trigonometrical principles without actual mensuration.

AL'TIN, n. A money of account in Russia, value three kopecks, or about three halfpence; also a lake in Siberia, ninety miles in length.

ALTIN'CAR, n. A species of factitious salt or powder, used in the fusion and purification of metals, prepared in various ways. [See TINCAL.]

ALTIS'ONANT, } a. [L. altus, high, and ALTIS'ONOUS, } sonans, sounding; sonus, sound.] High sounding; lofty or pompous, as language.

ALTISS'IMO, [Ital. the superlative of alto.] In music, an epithet for notes in the octave above the fifth line in the treble.

AL'TITUDE, n. [L. altitudo, of altus, high, and a common termination denoting state, condition, or manner.] 1. Space extended upward; height; the elevation of an object above its foundation; as, the altitude of a mountain, or column; or the elevation of an object or place above the surface on which we stand, or above the earth; as, the altitude of a cloud or meteor; or the elevation of one object above another, as of a bird above the top of a tree.—2. The elevation of a point, or star, or other object above the horizon.—3. Figuratively, high degree; superior excellence; highest point of excellence.

He is proud to the altitude of his virtue. Shak.

The altitude of the eye, in perspective, is a right line let fall from the eye, perpendicular to the geometrical plane. Altitude of a figure in geom., is the distance of its vertex from its base, or the length of a perpendicular, let fall from the vertex to the base. Accessible altitude, is the altitude of an object, whose base we can have access to, so as to measure the distance between it and the station from which the measure is to be taken. Inaccessible altitude is when the base of the object cannot be approached. Altitude of a heavenly body in astr., is the arch of a vertical circle intercepted between the body and the horizon. This altitude may be either true or apparent. Apparent altitude, is that which appears by sensible observations made at any place on the surface of the earth; and true altitude, is that which results by correcting the apparent, on account of refraction, parallax, and dip of the horizon. Refraction of altitude, is an arch of a vertical circle, by which the true altitude of a heavenly body is increased, on account of refraction. Parallax of altitude, [See PARALLAX.] Altitude or elevation of the pole, is the arch of the meridian intercepted between the pole and the horizon. It is equal to the latitude of the place. Meridian altitude, is an arch of the meridian between the horizon and any star or point on the meridian.

ALTIV'OLANT, a. [L. altus, high, and volans, flying.] Flying high.

AL'TO, [It. from L. altus.] High.
Alto and Basso, high and low, in old law, terms used to signify a submission of all differences of every kind to arbitration.

AL'TO-FAGGOTTA, or OCTAVE FAGOTTA. A new musical instrument which is very sonorous, the upper notes approximating closely to those of a horn, though much softer; the lower notes blending very harmoniously with those of the voice, piano-forte, &c. It is played with a reed and mouth piece similar to a clarionet. In form, it resembles a small bassoon.

AL'TO-OCTAVO, [It.] An octave higher.

AL'TO-PRIMO, [It.] The first or upper alto in music, in distinction from the alto-secondo, or lower alto.

AL'TO-RILIE'VO. [It.] High relief, in sculpt., is the projection of a figure, half or more, without being entirely detached.

Alto Rilievo.

AL'TO-RIPIE'NO, [It.] The tenor of the great chorus, which sings and plays only in particular places.

AL'TO-TENO'RE, [It.] The upper or counter-tenor part in music, which consists of several parts.

AL'TO-VIOLA, [It.] A small tenor viol.

AL'TO-VIOLINO, [It.] A small tenor violin.

ALTOGETH'ER, adv. [all and together. See TOGETHER.] Wholly; entirely; completely; without exception.
Every man at his best estate is altogether vanity; Ps. xxxix.

AL'UDEL, n. [a and lutum, without lute.] Among older chemists, aludels were glass or earthen pots without bottoms, that they might be fitted into each other, and used in sublimations. At the bottom of the furnace was a pot containing the matter to be sublimed, and at the top a head to receive the volatile matter.

AL'ULA, n. [L. ala, a wing.] In ornith., the group of ill-feathers, attached to the joint of the carpus, as in the snipe. These are also called the bastard wings.

AL'UM, n. [L. alumen.] A triple sulphate of alumina and potassa. This substance is white, transparent, and very astringent; but seldom found pure or crystallized. This salt is usually prepared by roasting and lixiviating certain clays containing pyrites, and to the lye adding a certain quantity of potassa: the salt is then obtained by crystallization. Alum is of great use in medicine and the arts. In medicine, it is used as an astringent; internally, in hemoptoë, diarrhœa, and dysentery; externally, as a styptic applied to bleeding vessels, and as an escharotic. In the arts, it is used in dyeing, to fix colours; in making candles, for hardening the tallow; in tanning, for restoring the cohesion of skins. It occurs in a native state only in small quantities.

AL'UM-EARTH, n. A massive mineral of a blackish brown colour, a dull lustre, an earthy and somewhat slaty fracture, sectile and rather soft.

ALU'MINA, } n. The base of alum,
AL'UMINE, } sometimes called argil, or the argillaceous earth. It is widely diffused over the globe in the shape of clay, loam, and other similar substances; the adamantine spar, the ruby and sapphire are alumina nearly pure and crystallized. It is white, powdery, and light, having neither taste nor smell, and adheres to the tongue. When moistened with water it forms a cohesive and ductile mass, susceptible of being kneaded into various forms. It was regarded as an elementary substance in chemistry, till Sir H. Davy discovered it to be a compound of a peculiar metallic base with oxygen. [See ALUMINUM.]

ALU'MINIFORM, a. Having the form of alumina.

AL'UMINITE, n. Subsulphate of alumina; a mineral that occurs in small roundish or reniform masses. Its colour is snow white or yellowish white.

ALU'MINOUS, a. Pertaining to alum or alumina, or partaking of the same properties. Aluminous waters, those which are impregnated either naturally or artificially with the properties of alum.

ALU'MINUM, n. The name given to the metallic base of Alumina. It is a grey powder resembling platina in appearance; when burnished, it has the lustre of tin, and when heated to redness in the air, it burns with great vividness; in pure oxygen, it burns with so great splendour, that the eye can scarcely support it.

AL'UMISH, a. Having the nature of alum; somewhat resembling alum.

ALUM'NUS, n. [L. from alo, to nourish.] A pupil; one educated at a seminary, or university, is called an alumnus of that institution.

AL'UM-SLATE, n. A slaty rock of a greyish, bluish, or iron black colour, and often possessed of a glossy shining lustre. It is chiefly composed of silex and alumine, and from it is obtained the largest part of the alum of commerce.

AL'UM-STONE, n. The silicious subsulphate of alumina and potash. A mineral of a greyish or yellowish white colour, found at Tolfa in Italy, in secondary rocks.

ALU'TA, n. [L.] A species of leather-stone, soft, pliable, and not laminated.

ALUTA'CEOUS, a. A pale brown colour like that of tanned leather.

ALUTA'TION, n. [L. aluta, tanned leather.] The tanning of leather.

AL'VEARY, n. [L. alvearium, alveare, a bee-hive, from alvus, the belly.] The hollow of the external ear, or bottom of the concha where the wax is contained.

AL'VEOLAR, } a. [L. alveolus, a soc-
AL'VEOLARY, } ket, from alveus, a hollow vessel.] Containing sockets, hollow cells, or pits; pertaining to sockets.

AL'VEOLATE, a. [L. alveolatus, from alveus, a hollow vessel.] Deeply pitted, so as to resemble a honey-comb; having the surface covered with numerous deep hollows, as in the receptacle of some compound flowers.

AL'VEOLE, } n. [L. dim. of alveus.]
ALVEO'LUS, } 1. A cell in a bee-hive, or in a fossil.—2. The socket in the jaw, in which a tooth is fixed.—3. A sea fossil of a conic figure, composed of a number of cells, like bee-hives, joined by a pipe of communication.

AL'VEOLITE, n. [L. alveolus, and Gr. λιθος.] In nat. hist., a kind of stony polypiers, of a globular or hemispherical shape; formed by numerous concentric beds, each composed of a union of little cells.

AL'VINE, a. [from alvus, the belly.] Belonging to the belly or intestines; relating to the intestinal excrements.

ALWAR'GRIM, n. The spotted plover Charadrius Apricarius.

AL'WAY, or AL'WAYS, adv. [all and way; Sax. eal, and weg, way; properly, a going, at all goings; hence, at all times.] 1. Perpetually; throughout all time; as, God is always the same.—2. Continually; without variation.
I do alway those things which please him; John viii.; Mat. xxviii.
3. Continually or constantly during a certain period, or regularly at stated intervals.
Mephibosheth shall eat bread alway at my table; 2 Sam. ix.
4. At all convenient times; regularly.
Cornelius prayed to God alway; Acts x.; Luke xviii; Eph. vi.
Alway is now seldom used. The application of this compound to time proceeds from the primary sense of way, which is a going or passing; hence, continuation.

A. M. stand for artium magister, master of arts, the second degree given by universities and colleges; called in some countries, doctor of philosophy.

A. M. stand also for anno mundi, in the year of the world; and for Ante Meridiem, before mid-day or noon.

AM, the first person of the verb to be, in the indicative mood, present tense; Sax. eom; Gr. ειμι; Goth im; Pers. am.
I AM that I AM; Ex. iii.

A'MA, or HA'MA, n. [D. aam, a vessel.] In church affairs, a vessel to contain wine for the eucharist; also a wine measure, as a cask, a pipe, &c.

A''MABILITY, n. [L. amabilis, from amo, to love.] Loveliness; the power of pleasing, or rather the combination of agreeable qualities which win the affections.

AMAD'AVAD, n. A small curious bird of the size of the crested wren; the upper part of the body is brown, the prime feathers of the wings black.

AMADET'TO, n. A sort of pear, so called, it is said, from a person who cultivated it.

AMAD'OGADE, n. A small beautiful bird in Peru; the upper part of its body and wings are of a lively green, its breast red, and its belly white.

AM'ADOT, n. A sort of pear.

AM'ADOU, n. An inflammable substance, got from the dried plant of Boletus Igniarius, by steeping it in saltpetre. This is written also amadow, and called black match, and pyrotechnical sponge, on account of its inflammability.

AMAIN′, adv. [Sax. a and mægn, force, strength. See MAY, MIGHT.] With force, strength, or violence; violently; furiously; suddenly; at once.

What, when we fled amain. Milton.

Let go amain, in seamen's language, or strike amain, is to let fall or lower at once.

AMAL′GAM, n. [Gr. μαλαγμα, from μαλασσω, to soften Its usual derivation is certainly erroneous.] 1. A compound of mercury or quicksilver with another metal; any metallic alloy, of which mercury forms an essential constituent part.—2. A mixture or compound of different things.

AMAL′GAMATE, v. t. To compound quicksilver with another metal. Gregory uses amalgamize.—2. To mix different things, to make a compound; to unite.

AMAL′GAMATE, v. i. To compound or unite in an amalgam; to blend.

AMAL′GAMATED, pp. Compounded with quicksilver; blended.

AMAL′GAMATING, ppr. Compounding quicksilver with another metal.

AMALGAMA′TION, n. The act or operation of compounding mercury with another metal.—2. The mixing or blending of different things.—3. In railways, the junction or union of two or more companies into one concern.

AMAN′DOLA, n. A green marble, having the appearance of honey-comb, and containing white spots; of 100 parts, 76 are mild calcareous earth, 20 schist, and 2 iron. The cellular appearance proceeds from the schist.

AMAN′ITINE, n. The poisonous principle of certain mushrooms, as agaricus muscarius, A. bulbosus, and others.

AMANUEN′SIS, n. [L. from manus, hand.] A person whose employment is to write what another dictates.

AM′ARANTH, n. A colour inclining to purple.

AM′ARANTH, } n. [Gr. αμαραντος, of AMARAN′TUS, } α neg. and μαραινω, to decay; so called, it is said, because, when cropped, it does not soon wither.] Flower gentle; a genus of plants, belonging to the natural order Amaranthaceæ. The species are found chiefly in tropical countries, and are all annuals. The tricoloured species has long been cultivated in gardens, on account of the beauty of its variegated leaves.

AMARANTH′INE, a. Belonging to amaranth; consisting of, containing, or resembling amaranth.

AMAR′ITUDE, n. [L. amaritudo, from amarus, bitter; from Heb. מר, mar, bitter.] Bitterness. [Not much us.]

AMARYL′LIS, n. [The name of a country girl in Theocritus and Virgil.] In bot., lily-daffodil, a genus of liliaceous plants of several species, which are cultivated in gardens for the beauty of their flowers. Their bulbs are sometimes poisonous.

AMAR′YTHRINE, n. The bitter principle of erythrine.

AMASS, v. t. [Fr. amasser; It. ammassare; L. massa, a heap or lump; Gr μαζα. See MASS.] 1. To collect into a heap; to gather a great quantity; to accumulate; as, to amass a treasure.—2. To collect in great numbers; to add many things together; as, to amass words or phrases.

AMASS, n. An assemblage, heap, or accumulation. [This is superseded by Mass.]

AMASSED, pp. Collected in a heap, or in a great quantity or number; accumulated.

AMASS′ING, ppr. Collecting in a heap; or in a large quantity or number.

AMASS′MENT, n. A heap collected; a large quantity or number brought together; an accumulation.

AMATE,† v. i. [See MATE.] To accompany; also, to terrify, to perplex.

AMATEUR, n [Fr. from L. amator, a lover, from amo, to love.] A person attached to a particular pursuit, study, or science, as to music or painting, without regard to gain or emolument; one who has a taste for the arts.

AM′ATIVENESS, n. A term in phrenology, applied to one of the propensities. Its organ is situated at the back part of the head, between the mastoid process on each side, and is that portion of the brain denominated the cerebellum. It is supposed to be the seat of sexual passion, the degree of which is indicated by the size of the organ; those in which the development of the organ is greatest, being most under the influence of this passion.

AMATO′RIAL, } a. [L. amatorius, from
AM′ATORY, } amo, to love.] 1. Relating to love; as, amatorial verses; causing love; as, amatory potions; produced by sexual intercourse; as amatorial progeny.—2. In anat., a term applied to the oblique muscles of the eye, from their use in ogling.

AMATO′RIALLY, adv. In an amatorial manner; by way of love.

AMATO′RIOUS, a. Pertaining to love.

AMAURŌSIS, n. [Gr. αμαυρος, obscure.] A loss or decay of sight from a palsy of the optic nerve, without any visible defect in the eye, except an immovable pupil; called also gutta serena. Sometimes the disease is periodical, coming on suddenly, continuing for hours or days, and then disappearing. It arises from a paralysis of the retina, or optic nerve, and is sometimes complicated with cataract. It has sometimes been cured by electricity.

AMAUS′ITE, n. See PETROSILEX.

AMĀZE, v. t. [Qu. Ar. amasa, to perplex or confuse; or from maze.] To confound with fear, sudden surprise, or wonder; to astonish.

They shall be afraid; they shall be amazed at one another; Is. xiii.

They were all amazed and glorified God; Mark ii.; Luke v.

This word implies astonishment or perplexity, arising from something extraordinary, unexpected, unaccountable, or frightful.

AMĀZE, n. Astonishment; confusion; perplexity, arising from fear, surprise, or wonder. It is chiefly used in poetry, and is nearly synonymous with amazement.

AMĀZED, pp. Astonished; confounded with fear, surprise, or wonder.

AMĀZEDLY, adv. With amazement; in a manner to confound. [Lit. us.]

AMĀZEDNESS, n. The state of being confounded with fear, surprise, or wonder; astonishment, great wonder.

AMĀZEMENT, n. Astonishment; confusion, or perplexity, from a sudden impression of fear, surprise, or wonder. It is sometimes accompanied with fear or terror; sometimes merely extreme wonder or admiration at some great, sudden, or unexpected event, at an unusual sight, or at the narration of extraordinary events.

AMAZING, ppr. Confounding with fear, surprise, or wonder.—2. a. Very wonderful; exciting astonishment, or perplexity.

AMĀZINGLY, adv. In an astonishing degree; in a manner to excite astonishment, or to perplex, confound or terrify.

AM′AZON, n. [This is said to be formed of a neg. and μαζος, breast. History informs us, that the Amazons cut off their right breast, that it might not incommode them in shooting and hurling the javelin. This is doubtless a fable.] 1. The Amazons are said by historians, to have been a race of female warriors, who founded an empire on the river Thermodon, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Euxine. They are said to have excluded men from their society; and by their warlike enterprises, to have conquered and alarmed surrounding nations. Some writers treat these accounts as fables.—2. By analogy, a warlike or masculine woman; a virago.—3. This name has been given to some American females, on the banks of the largest river in the world, who joined their husbands in attacking the Spaniards that first visited the country. This trivial occurrence gave the name Amazon to that river, whose real name is Maranon.

Amazon.

AMAZO′NIAN, a. Pertaining to or resembling an Amazon. Applied to females, bold; of masculine manners; warlike.—2. Belonging to the river Maranon in South America, or to Amazonia, the country lying on that river.

Amazonian stone, a beautiful green feldspar, found in rolled masses near the Amazon river.

AMB, AM. About; around; used in composition. Sax. emb. ymb; W. am; Ir. im, um; Gr. αμφι; Lat. am or amb.

AMBA′GES, n. [L. amb and ago, to drive.] 1. A circumlocution; a circuit of words to express ideas which may be expressed in fewer words. Subterfuges; evasions.—2. A winding or turning.

AMBA′GIOUS, a. Circumlocutory.

AMBAS′SADOR, n. [This is the more common orthography; but good authors write also embassador; and as the orthography of embassy is established, it would be better to write embassador, as it is written by Blackstone. Fr. ambassadeur.] A minister of the highest rank employed by one prince or state at the court of another, to manage the public concerns, or support the interests of his own prince or state, and representing the power and dignity of his sovereign or state. Ambassadors are ordinary, when they reside permanently at a foreign court; or extraordinary, when they are sent on a special occasion. They are also called ministers. Envoys are ministers employed on special occasions, and are of less dignity than ambassadors. The term ambassador is commonly used, by writers on public law, to designate every kind of diplomatic agent or minister. The person of an ambassador is inviolable.

AMBAS'SADRESS, n. [Fr. ambassadrice.] 1. The wife or lady of an ambassador.—2. A woman sent on a public message.

AM'BE or AM'BI, n. [Gr. αμβη, a brim; from amb, about.] Literally, a brim; but in surg., an instrument for reducing dislocated shoulders, so called because its extremity is rounded to fit into the axilla. It is the most ancient mechanical contrivance for the above purpose; but it is not now used.

AM'BER, n. [Fr. ambre; Pers. anbar or anabar; Ar. anbaron. In 1 Kings x. 2, 10, the Arabic is rendered spices. The Arabic word is rendered by Castle, amber, a marine fish, a shield made of skins, crocus and fimus. In Eth. anbara, is rendered a whale; and the word is used in Jonah ii. 1.; Mat. xii. 40. This word is placed by Castle under annaba, to produce grapes, and signifies grapes, Ch. and Heb. ענב, onab. The Chaldee verb signifies to join or connect, and the sense of this word, applied to grapes, is a cluster, like grape in English. It signifies also in Ch. a tumour, a pustule, a mountain, the sense of which is a lump or mass collected; and this may be the sense of amber. In German, Dutch, Swedish, and Danish, it has the name of burnstone.] A hard semi-pellucid substance, tasteless and without smell except when pounded or heated, when it emits a fragrant odour. It is found in alluvial soils, or on the sea-shore, in many places; particularly on the shores of the Baltic, in Europe, and at Cape Sable, in Maryland, in the United States. The ancient opinion of its vegetable origin seems now to be established, and it is believed or known to be a fossil resin. It yields by distillation an empyreumatic oil, and the succinic acid, which sublimes in small white needles. Its colour usually presents some tinge of yellow. It is highly electrical, and is the basis of a varnish.

AM'BER, a. Consisting of, or resembling amber.

AM'BER, v. t. To scent with amber.

AM'BER-DRINK, n. A drink resembling amber in colour.

AM'BER-DROPPING, a. Dropping amber.

AM'BER-SEED, n. Musk-seed, resembling millet. It is of a bitterish taste, and brought from Egypt and the West Indies.

AM'BER-TREE, n. The English name of a species of Anthospermum, a shrub, with evergreen leaves, which, when bruised, emit a fragrant odour.

AM'BERGRIS, n. [amber and Fr. gris, gray; gray amber.] A solid, opaque, ash-coloured inflammable substance, variegated like marble, remarkably light, rugged on its surface, and when heated, it has a fragrant odour. It does not effervesce with acids; it melts easily into a kind of yellow resin, and is highly soluble in spirit of wine. Various opinions have been entertained respecting its origin; but it is well ascertained that it is a morbid secretion into the intestines of the spermaceti whale, a species of Physeter. It has been found in that species of whale, but usually is found floating on the surface of the ocean, in regions frequented by whales; sometimes in masses of from 60 to 225 lbs. weight. In this substance are found the beaks of the cuttle fish, on which that whale is known to feed. It is highly valued as a material in perfumery.

AM'BIDEXTER, n. [L. ambo, both, and dexter, the right hand.] 1. A person who uses both hands with equal facility.—2. A double dealer; one equally ready to act on either side in party disputes. [This sense is used in ludicrous language.]—3. In law, a juror who takes money from both parties, for giving his verdict; an embracer.

AMBIDEXTER'ITY, AMBIDEX'TROUSNESS, n. The faculty of using both hands with equal facility; double dealing; the taking of money from both parties for a verdict.

AMBIDEX'TROUS, a. Having the faculty of using both hands with equal ease; practising or siding with both parties.

AM'BIENT, a. [L. ambiens, from ambio, to go round, from amb, about, and eo to go.] Surrounding; encompassing on all sides; investing; applied to fluids or diffusible substances; as, the ambient air.

AMBIG'ENAL, a. [L. ambo, both, and genu, a knee.] An ambigenal hyperbola is one of the triple hyperbolas of the second order, having one of its infinite legs falling within an angle formed by the asymptotes, and the other without.

AM'BIGU, n. [Fr. See AMBIGUITY.] An entertainment or feast, consisting of a medley of dishes.

AMBIGU'ITY, n. [L. ambiguitas, from ambigo.] Doubtfulness or uncertainty of signification, from a word's being susceptible of different meanings; double meaning; as, words should be used which admit of no ambiguity.

AMBIG'UOUS, a. [L. ambiguus.] Having two or more meanings; doubtful; being of uncertain signification; susceptible of different interpretations; hence, obscure. It is applied to words and expressions; not to a dubious state of mind, though it may be to a person using words of doubtful signification; as, the ancient oracles were ambiguous, as were their answers.

AMBIG'UOUSLY, adv. In an ambiguous manner; with doubtful meaning.

AMBIG'UOUSNESS, n. The quality of being ambiguous; uncertainty of meaning; ambiguity; and hence, obscurity.

AMBIL'OGY, n. [L. ambo, both, and Gr. λογος, speech.] Talk or language of doubtful meaning.

AMBIL'OQUOUS, a. [L. ambo, both, and loquor, to speak.] Using ambiguous expressions.

AM'BIT, n. [L. ambitus, a circuit, from ambio, to go about. See AMBIENT.] The line that encompasses a thing; in geom., the perimeter of a figure, or the surface of a body. The periphery or circumference of a circular body.

AMBI'TION, n. [L. ambitio, from ambio, to go about, or to seek by making interest, of amb, about, and eo, to go. See AMBAGES. This word had its origin in the practice of Roman candidates for office, who went about the city to solicit votes.] A desire of preferment, or of honour; a desire of excellence or superiority. It is used in a good sense; as, emulation may spring from a laudable ambition. It denotes also an inordinate desire of power, or eminence, often accompanied with illegal means to obtain the object. It is sometimes followed by of; as, a man has an ambition of wit. Milton has used the word in the Latin sense of going about, or attempting; but this sense is hardly legitimate.

AMBI''TION, v. t. [Fr. ambitionner.] Ambitiously to seek after. [Lit. us.]

AMBI'TIONLESS, a. Devoid of ambition.

AMBI''TIOUS, a. Desirous of power, honour, office, superiority, or excellence; aspiring; eager for fame; followed by of before a noun; as, ambitious of glory.—2. Showy; adapted to command notice or praise; as, ambitious ornaments.—3. Figuratively, eager to swell or rise higher; as, the ambitious ocean.

AMBI''TIOUSLY, adv. In an ambitious manner; with an eager desire after preferment or superiority.

AMBI''TIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being ambitious; ambition. Being nearly synonymous with ambition, it is not often used.

AM'BITUS, n. In conchol., the circumference or outline of the valves.

AM'BLE, v. i. [Fr. ambler, from L. ambulo, to walk; Qu. amb, about, and the root of Fr. aller.] 1. To move with a certain peculiar pace, as a horse, first lifting his two legs on one side, and then changing to the other.—2. To move easy, without hard shocks.

Him time ambles withal. Shak

3. In a ludicrous sense, to move with submission, or by direction, or to move affectedly.

AM'BLE, n. A peculiar pace of a horse.

AM'BLER, n. A horse which ambles; a pacer.

AMBRE'IC AC'ID, n. An acid formed by digesting ambreine in nitric acid.

AMBRE'INE, n. A peculiar fatty substance obtained from ambergris. It is crystallized, of a brilliant white colour, and has an agreeable odour.

AMBRO'SIA, n. (ambro'zha.) [Gr. ἀ neg. and βροτος, mortal, because it was supposed to confer immortality on them that fed on it.] 1. In heathen antiquity, the imaginary food of the gods. Hence,—2. Whatever is very pleasing to the taste or smell. The name has also been given to certain alexipharmic compositions.—3. In bot., a genus of plants belonging to the natural order Compositæ, or to Syngenesia Polygamia Superflua of Linn.

AMBRO'SIAC, a. Having the qualities of ambrosia.

AMBRO'SIAL, a. (ambro'zhal.) Partaking of the nature or qualities of ambrosia; fragrant; delighting the taste or smell; as, ambrosial dews. Ben Jonson uses ambrosiac in a like sense, and Bailey has ambrosian, but these seem not to be warranted by usage.

AMBROSIALIZ'E,† v. t. To render ambrosial.

AMBRO'SIALLY, adv. In an ambrosial way.

AM'BROSIAN, a. Pertaining to St. Ambrose. The Ambrosian office, or ritual, is a formula of worship in the church of Milan, instituted by St. Ambrose in the fourth century.

AM'BROSIN, n. In the middle ages, a coin struck by the dukes of Milan, on which St. Ambrose was represented on horseback, with a whip in his right hand.

AM'BRY, n. [Contracted from Fr. aumonerie, almonry, from old Fr. almoigne, alms.] 1. An almonry; a place where alms are deposited for distribution to the poor.—2. In the ancient churches and cathedrals the ambry was frequently in the form of a niche, or hollow space in the thickness of the wall, with a door to it, and placed by the side of an altar, to contain the utensils belonging thereto; but in the larger churches and cathedrals, the ambries were very numerous, used for various purposes, and placed in various parts of the edifice, and even in the cloisters. They were frequently of wainscot, and sometimes of considerable size, answering to what we should now call closets, but the doors and other parts that were seen were usually richly carved with open work. In ancient abbeys and priories there was an office of this name, in which the almoner lived. 3. A place in which are deposited the utensils for housekeeping; also, a cupboard; a place for cold victuals.

Ambry, Romsey Church, Hampshire

AMBS'-ACE, n. [L. ambo, both, and ace.] A double ace, as when two dice turn up the ace.

AM'BULANT, a. [L. ambulans, from ambulo.] Walking; moving from place to place.

Ambulant brokers, in Amsterdam, are exchange-brokers or agents, who are not sworn, and whose testimony is not received in courts of justice.

Ambulant, in her., walking or passant. Ambulant-Co., walking together.

In arch., a gallery, cloister or alley for walking in.

AMBUL'IA, n. A genus of plants of the Didynamia Angiospermia class and order. It grows in Malabar, has an aromatic smell, and is administered in cases of fever, in the form of a decoction.

AM'BURY, or AN'BURY, n. [Qu. L. umbo, the navel; Gr. ἀμβων.] Among farriers, a tumour, wart, or swelling on a horse, full of blood and soft to the touch.

AM'BUSCADE, n. [Fr. embuscade; from It. imboscare, Sp. emboscar, to lie in bushes, or concealed; in and bosco, bosque, a wood; Eng. bush.] 1. Literally, a lying in a wood, concealed, for the purpose of attacking an enemy by surprise: hence, a lying in wait, and concealed in any situation, for a like purpose.—2. A private station in which troops lie concealed, with a view to attack their enemy by surprise; ambush.

AM'BUSCADE, v. t. To lie in wait for, or to attack from a concealed position.

AM'BUSCADED, pp. Having an ambush laid against, or attacked from a private station; as, his troops were ambuscaded.

AM'BUSCADING, ppr. Lying in wait for; attacking from a secret station.

AM'BUSH, n. [Fr. embûche, of in and bush. See BUSH.] 1. A private or concealed station, where troops lie in wait to attack their enemy by surprise. —2. The state of lying concealed, for the purpose of attacking by surprise; a lying in wait.—3. The troops posted in a concealed place for attacking by surprise.

Lay thee an ambush for the city; Josh. viii.

AM'BUSH, v. t. To lie in wait for; to surprise, by assailing unexpectedly from a concealed place.

AM'BUSH, v. i. To lie in wait; for the purpose of attacking by surprise.

Nor saw the snake, that ambush'd for his prey. Trumbull.

AM'BUSHED, pp. Lain in wait for; suddenly attacked from a concealed station.

AMBUSH'ING, ppr. Lying in wait for; attacking from a concealed station.

AM'BUSHMENT, n. An ambush; which see.

AM'BUSTION, n. [L. ambustio, from amburo, to burn or scorch; of amb, about, and uro, to burn.] Among physicians, a burning; a burn or scald, which is a lesion of some part of the body.

AMEI'VA, n. A genus of lizards found in Brazil.

AM'EL, n. [Fr. émail.] The matter with which metallic bodies are overlaid; but its use is superseded by Enamel; which see.

AM'ELI, n. A Malabar plant, the leaves of which are said to be useful in colic, and its root, boiled in oil, is applied to tumours as a discutient.

AME'LIORABLE, a. That may be meliorated.

AMEL'IORATE, v. t. [Fr. améliorer, from L. melior, better.] To make better: to improve; to meliorate.

AMEL'IORATE, v. i. To grow better; to meliorate.

AME'LIORATING, ppr. Becoming, or making better.

AMELIORA'TION, n. A making or becoming better; improvement; melioration.

A'MEN'. This word, with slight differences of orthography, is in all the dialects of the Assyrian stock. As a verb, it signifies to confirm, establish, verify; to trust, or give confidence; as a noun, truth, firmness, trust, confidence; as an adjective, firm, stable. In English, after the oriental manner, it is used at the beginning, but more generally at the end of declarations and prayers, in the sense of, be it firm, be it established.

And let all the people say amen; Ps cvi.

The word is used also as a noun: "All the promises of God are amen in Christ," that is, firmness, stability, constancy.

AME'NABLE, a. [It. menare; Fr. amener, It. ammainare, in marine lan., to strike sail.] 1.† In old law, easy to be led; governable, as a woman by her husband.—2. Liable to answer; responsible; answerable; liable to be called to account; as, every man is amenable to the laws. We retain this idiom in the popular phrase, to bring in, to make answerable; as, a man is brought in to pay the debt of another.

AMEN'ABLENESS, } n. The state of AMENABIL'ITY, } being amenable; liability to answer.

AME'NABLY, adv. In an amenable manner.

AM'ENAGE,† v. t. [L. manus.] To manage, keep under, or in a state of accountableness.

AM'ENANCE,† n. Management, conduct; mien or carriage.

AMEND', v. t. [Fr. amender; L. emendo, of e neg. and menda, mendum, a fault; W. mann, a spot or blemish. See MEND.] 1. To correct; to rectify by expunging a mistake; as, to amend a law.—2. To reform, by quitting bad habits; to make better in a moral sense; as, to amend our ways or our conduct.—3 To correct; to supply a defect; to improve or make better, by some addition of what is wanted, as well as by expunging what is wrong; as, to amend a bill before a legislature. Hence it is applied to the correction of authors, by restoring passages which had been omitted, or restoring the true reading.

AMEND', v. i. To grow or become better, by reformation, or rectifying something wrong in manners or morals. It differs from improve in this, that to amend implies something previously wrong; to improve, does not.

AMEND', } n. [Fr.] A pecuniary
AMENDE', } punishment, or fine. The amende honorable, in France, was an infamous punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides, and sacrilegious persons. The offender, being led into court with a rope about his neck, begged pardon of his God, the court, &c. These words denote also a recantation in open court, or in presence of the injured person.

AMEND'ABLE, a. That may be amended; capable of correction; as, an amendable writ or error.

AMEND'ATORY, a. That amends; supplying amendment; corrective.

AMEND'ED, pp. Corrected; rectified; reformed; improved, or altered for the better.

AMEND'ER, n. The person that amends.

AMEND'FUL, a. Full of improvement.

AMEND'ING, ppr. Correcting; reforming; altering for the better.

AMEND'MENT, n. An alteration or change for the better; correction of a fault or faults; reformation of life, by quitting vices.—2. A word, clause, or paragraph, added, or proposed to be added to a bill before a legislature.—3. In law, the correction of an error in a writ or process. Shakspeare uses it for the recovery of health, but this sense is unusual. Amendment of the libel, in Scots law, an addition or alteration made upon the conclusions of the summons. It is made by permission of the judge.

AMENDS', n. plur. [Fr. amende.] Compensation for an injury; recompense; satisfaction; equivalent; as, the happiness of a future life will more than make amends for the miseries of this.

AMEN'ITY, n. [L. amœnitas; Fr. aménité; L. amœnus; W. mwyn, good, kind.] Pleasantness; agreeableness of situation; that which delights the eye; used of places and prospects.

AMENORRHŒ'A, n. [α priv. μην, a month, ῥεω, to flow.] An obstruction of the menses from other causes than pregnancy and advanced age.

A mensa et thoro. [L.] From board and bed. A divorce from board and bed is when a husband and wife separate, but the husband maintains the wife.

AM'ENT, } n. [L. amentum, a thong
AMENT'UM } or strap.] In bot, a species of inflorescence, consisting of numerous scales or bracts which inclose stamens, and are ranged along a stalk or axis. The true amentum or catkin, is articulated with the branch and deciduous, and is well seen in the willow or hazel. Occasionally the term is also applied to inflorescence of a similar nature, including pistils, and not falling off till the fruit is ripe, as is seen in the fruit-bearing spikes of the willow.

Amentum.

AMENTA'CEOUS, a. Growing in an ament; resembling a thong. An appellation given to such plants as have their flowers in aments or catkins.

AMEN'TIA, n. [Lat.] Among physicians, imbecility of mind, in which the relations of things are either not perceived or not recollected. When it originates at birth, it is called natural idiotism, and when from the infirmities of age, dotage, or second childhood.

AMERCE, v. t. (amers'). [A verb formed from à for on or at, and Fr. merci, mercy, or from L. merces, reward.] 1. To inflict a penalty at mercy; to punish by a pecuniary penalty, the amount of which is not fixed by law, but left to the discretion or mercy of the court; as, the court amerced the criminal in the sum of one hundred pounds.—2. To inflict a pecuniary penalty; to punish in general. Milton uses of after amerce: "Millions of spirits amerced of heaven;" but this use seems to be a poetic license.

AMER'CED, pp. Fined at the discretion of a court.

AMERC'EMENT, n. (amers'ment). A pecuniary penalty inflicted on an offender at the discretion of the court. It differs from a fine, in that the latter is, or was originally, a fixed and certain sum prescribed by statute for an offence; but an amercement is arbitrary. Hence the practice of affeering. [See AFFEER.] In America, the word fine is now used for a pecuniary penalty which is uncertain; and it is common in statutes, to enact that an offender shall be fined at the discretion of the court. In England also, fines are now usually discretionary. Thus the word fine has, in a measure, superseded the use of amercement. This word, in old books, is written amerciament.

Amercement royal, is a penalty imposed on an officer for a misdemeanour in his office.

AMER'CER, n. One who sets a fine at discretion upon an offender.

AMER'ICA, n. [From Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine, who pretended to have first discovered the western continent.] One of the great continents first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, June 11, O. S. 1498, and by Columbus, or Christoval Colon, Aug. 1, the same year. It extends from the eightieth degree of North, to the fifty-fourth degree of South latitude; and from the thirty-fifth to the one hundred and fifty-sixth degree of longitude West from Greenwich, being about nine thousand miles in length. Its breadth at Darien is narrowed to about forty-five miles, but at the northern extremity is nearly four thousand miles. From Darien to the North, the continent is called North America, and to the South, it is called South America.

AMER'ICAN, a. Pertaining to America.

AMER'ICAN, n. A native of America; originally applied to the aboriginals, or copper-coloured races, found here by the Europeans; but now applied to the descendants of Europeans born in America.

The name American must always exalt the pride of patriotism. Washington.

AMER'ICANISM, n. The love which American citizens have to their own country, or the preference of its interests. Analogically, an American idiom.

AMER'ICANIZE, v. t. To render American; to naturalize in America.

AMER'ICIM, n. A species of lizard in South America, not more than two inches in length, and the third of an inch in diameter. Its legs are of the size of a hog's bristle.

AMES-ACE. See AMBSACE.

AMETABO'LIAN, n. [Gr. α neg. and μεταβαλλω, to change.] In zool., an animal that does not undergo a metamorphosis.

AMETH'ODIST,† n. A quack.

AM'ETHYST, n. [L. amethystus; Gr. [illegible]] which the Greeks supposed to be formed from [illegible] and [illegible] to inebriate, from some supposed quality in the stone of resisting intoxication. Plin. xxxvii. 9, mentions an opinion that it takes its name from its colour approaching that of wine, but not reaching it.] A sub-species of quartz, of a violet blue colour, of different degrees of intensity. It generally occurs crystallized in hexahedral prisms, or pyramids; also in rolled fragments, composed of imperfect prismatic crystals. Its fracture is conchoidal or splintery. It is wrought into various articles of jewelry.

AM'ETHYST, in her., signifies a purple colour. It is the same in a nobleman's escutcheon, as purpure in a gentleman's, and mercury in that of a prince.

AMETHYST'INE, a. Pertaining to, or resembling amethyst; anciently applied to a garment of the colour of amethyst, as distinguished from the Tyrian and hyacinthine purple.

AM'IA, n. A genus of fish, of the Abdominal order, found in the rivers of Carolina.

AMIABIL'ITY, n. Amiableness.

A'MIABLE, a. [Fr. aimable; L. amabilis, from amo, to love.] 1. Lovely; worthy of love; deserving of affection; applied usually to persons. But in Ps. lxxxiv. 1, there is an exception: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord!" —2. Pretending or showing love.

Lay amiable siege to the honesty of this Ford's wife. Shak.

But this use is not legitimate.

A'MIABLENESS, n. The quality of deserving love; loveliness.

A'MIABLY, adv. In an amiable manner; in a manner to excite or attract love.

AM'IANTH, } n. [Gr. αμιαντος, of α
AMIANT'US, } neg. and μιαινω, to pollute or vitiate; so called from its incombustibility; Plin. 36, 19.] Earth-flax, or mountain flax; a mineral substance somewhat resembling flax; usually grayish, or of a greenish white; sometimes of a yellowish or silvery white, olive, or mountain green, of a pale flesh red or ochre colour. It is composed of delicate filaments, very flexible, and somewhat elastic, often long, and resembling threads of silk. It is incombustible, and has sometimes been wrought into cloth and paper. It is the same as Asbestos, which see.

AMIANTH'IFORM, a. [amianth and form.] Having the form or likeness of amianth.

Amianthiform arseniate of copper. Phillips.

AMIANTH'INITE, n. A species of amorphous mineral, a variety of actinolite; its colour ash, greenish, or yellowish gray, often mixed with yellow or red; its fracture confusedly foliated and fibrous.

AMIANTH'OID, n. [amianth, and Gr. ειδος, form.] A mineral which occurs in tufts, composed of long capillary filaments, flexible and very elastic; more flexible than the fibres of asbestus, but stiffer and more elastic than those of amianth. The colour is olive green, or greenish white.

AMIANTH'OID, a. Resembling amianth in form.

AM'ICABLE, a. [L. amicabilis, from amicus, a friend, from amo, to love.] 1. Friendly; peaceable; harmonious in social or mutual transactions; usually applied to the dispositions of men who have business with each other, or to their intercourse and transactions; as, nations or men have come to an amicable adjustment of their differences.—2. Disposed to peace and friendship; as, an amicable temper. [But rarely applied to a single person.]

Amicable numbers, in arith., such as are mutually equal to the sum of one another's aliquot parts, as 284 and 220.

AM'ICABLENESS, n. The quality of being peaceable, friendly, or disposed to peace; friendliness; a disposition to preserve peace and friendship.

AM'ICABLY, adv. In a friendly manner; with harmony or good will; without controversy; as, the dispute was amicably adjusted.

AM'ICE, n. [L. amictus, from amicior, to clothe; Fr. amict; Sp. amito; Port. amicto.] A square linen cloth that a Catholic priest ties about his neck, hanging down behind under the alb, when he officiates at mass.

AMID', AMIDST', prep. [of a and Sax. midd, the middle, L. medius.] Amidst is the superlative degree middest, a contraction of Sax. mid-mesta, mid-most. [See MIDDLE and MIDST.] 1. In the midst or middle.—2. Among; mingled with; as, a shepherd amidst his flock.—3. Surrounded, encompassed, or enveloped with; as, amidst the shade; amid the waves. Amid is used mostly in poetry.

AM'IDE, AM'IDET, n. [Formed from ammonia, as bromid and bromuret from bromine. Should not these terms have been ammid and ammidet?] The name of a substance consisting of one equivalent of nitrogen and two of hydrogen. It has not yet been obtained in a separate state, but it enters into a large number of compounds. These are called by terms made up of the name of the other ingredient prefixed to the word amide, as sodamide, a compound of sodium and amide.

AM'IDINE, n. A peculiar substance procured from wheat and potato starch. It is opaque, or semitransparent, white, or yellowish white, inodorous, insipid, and very friable. It is the substance contained in the interior of the outer covering of the starch or amylin.

AMID'-SHIPS, in marine lan., the middle of a ship, with regard to her length and breadth.

AM'ILENE, n. A colourless liquid produced by the action of anhydrous phosphoric acid, upon the hydrated oxide of amule.

AM'ILOT, n. A white fish in the Mexican lakes, more than a foot in length, and much esteemed at the table.

AMISS', a. [a and miss. See MISS.] 1. Wrong; faulty; out of order; improper; as, it may not be amiss to ask advice. [This adjective always follows its noun.]—2. adv. In a faulty manner; contrary to propriety; truth, law, or morality.

Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss; James iv.

Applied to the body, it signifies indisposed; as, I am somewhat amiss to-day.

Amittere legem terræ. A law phrase, importing the loss of the liberty of swearing in any court, the punishment of jurors found guilty in a writ of attaint, and of persons outlawed.

AM'ITY, n. [Fr. amitié; Sp. amistad, from amistar, to reconcile; Norm. amistee, friendship, amez, friends, ameis, amets, beloved; Qu. L. amo, amicitia.] Friendship, in a general sense, between individuals, societies or nations; harmony; good understanding; as, our nation is in amity with all the world; a treaty of amity and commerce.

AM'MA, n. [Heb. אם, am, mother.] 1. An abbess or spiritual mother.—2. A girdle or truss used in ruptures. [Gr. αμμα.]

AM'MAN, n. [G. amtmann; Sax. ambaht or embeht; office, duty, charge, and man. See EMBASSADOR.] An officer who, in Switzerland and in some parts of Germany, exercises judicial functions in a limited district of country. A similar officer formerly existed in France.

AM'MELIDE, n. A product of the decomposition of melam, melamine, and ammeline, by concentrated acids discovered by Liebig.

AM'MELINE, n. A saline base, discovered by Liebig. It is a product of the decomposition of melam and melamine, by acids and alkalies.

AM'MITE, or HAM'MITE, n. [Gr. αμμος, sand.] A sand-stone or free-stone, of a pale brown colour, very heavy, of a lax texture, composed of small round granules, cemented by an earthy sparry matter. The grit or granules are small stalagmites, composed of crusts or coats, including one another. It is the roe-stone or oölite of recent authors.

AM'MOCETE, n. An obsolete name of the ammodyte In Cuvier, the name of a genus of fish, including the lampern, Petromyzon branchialis, Linn.

AM'MOCHRYSE, n. (am'mokris.) [Gr. αμμος, sand, and χρυσος, gold.] A yellow soft stone, found in Germany, consisting of glossy yellow particles. When rubbed or ground, it is used to strew over writing, like black sand with us. Qu. yellow mica.

AM'MODYTE, n. [Gr. αμμος, sand, and δυω, to enter.] The sand eel, a genus of fish, of the Apodal order, about a foot in length, with a compressed head, a long slender body, and scales hardly perceptible. There is but one species, the Tobianus or lance. It buries itself in the sand, and is found also in the stomach of the porpoise, which indicates that the latter fish roots up the sand like a hog. This name is also given to a serpent of the size of a viper, and of a yellowish colour, found in Africa; also to a large serpent of Ceylon, of a whitish ash colour, and very venomous.

AMMO'NIA, AM'MONY, n. [The real origin of this word is not ascertained. Some authors suppose it to be from Ammon, a title of Jupiter, near whose temple in Upper Egypt it was generated. Others suppose it to be from Ammonia, a Cyrenaic territory; and others deduce it from αμμος, sand, as it was found in sandy ground. Anglicized, this forms an elegant word, ammony.] The modern name of the volatile alkali, formerly so called, to distinguish it from the more fixed alkalies. It is a gaseous body, and was first procured in that state by Priestley, who termed it alkaline air. He obtained it from sal-ammoniac. It is composed of nitrogen and hydrogen. Ammonia is used for many purposes, both in medicine and scientific chemistry. It is not, however, used in the gaseous state, but in solution in water, and then frequently called liquid ammonia. It may be procured naturally from putrescent animal substances, and artificially from most animal matter, except fat, by subjecting it to heat, in iron cylinders. Bones, hoofs, and horns, decomposed, yield it in abundance. It may also be obtained from vegetable matter, when azote is one of its elements. The decomposition of coal, effected during the production of gas for illumination, is now an abundant source of ammonia.

AMMO'NIAC, AMMONI'ACAL, a. Pertaining to ammonia, or possessing its properties.

AMMO'NIAC or AMMO'NIAC GUM, n. [See AMMONIA.] A gum resin, from Africa and the East, brought in large masses, composed of tears, internally white, and externally yellow; an exudation from an umbelliferous plant, the Dorema ammoniacum. It has a fœtid smell, and a nauseous sweet taste, followed by a bitter one. It is inflammable, soluble in water and spirit of wine, and is used in medicine as a deobstruent and resolvent.

AMMONI'ACAL GAS, n. Ammonia in its purest form. It is usually obtained from hydrochlorate of ammonia and lime.

AMMONI'ACAL SALT, n. A salt formed by the union of ammonia with an acid.

AMMO'NIAN, a. Relating to Ammonius, surnamed Saccas, of Alexandria, who flourished at the end of the second century, and was the founder of the eclectic system of philosophy; or rather, he completed the establishment of the sect, which originated with Potamo.

AM'MONITE, n. [Cornu Ammonis, from Jupiter Ammon, whose statues were represented with ram's horns.] Serpent-stone, or cornu ammonis, a fossil shell curved into a spiral, like a ram's horn; of various sizes, from the smallest grains to three feet in diameter. This fossil is found in strata of limestone and clay, and in argillaceous iron ore. It is smooth or rigid; the ridges straight, crooked, or undulated.

AMMONITIF'EROUS, a. Containing the remains of ammonites.

AMMO'NIUM, n. A name given to the supposed metallic basis of ammonia. It is a compound of nitrogen and hydrogen, containing a greater proportion of the latter than is contained in ammonia. If mercury, at the negative pole of a galvanic battery, be placed in contact with a solution of ammonia, and the circuit be completed, an amalgam is formed, which, at the temperature of 70° or 80° of Fahrenheit, is of the consistence of butter, but at the freezing point is a firm and crystallized mass. This amalgam is supposed to be formed by the metallic basis, ammonium.

AMMONI'URET, AMMONI'ARET, n. A term once applied to certain supposed compounds of ammonia, and a pure metal. All of these have been ascertained to be salts composed of ammonia with an acid of the metal, which renders the term incorrect and useless.

AMMOSCHIS'TA, n. A genus of stones of a laminated structure, and splitting only horizontally, or into flat plates.

AMMUNI''TION, n. [L. ad and munitio, from munio, to fortify.] Military stores, or provisions for attack or defence. In modern usage, the signification is confined to the articles which are used in the discharge of fire-arms and ordnance of all kinds; as powder, balls, bombs, various kinds of shot, &c. Ammunition-bread, bread or other provisions to supply troops.

AM'NESTY, n. [Gr. αμνηστια, of α neg. and μνησις, memory, from the root of mens, mind. See MIND.] An act of oblivion; a general pardon of the offences of subjects against the government, or the proclamation of such pardon. In med., the loss of memory from disease or old age.

AM'NIOS, or AM'NION, n. [Gr. αμνιον, a vessel or membrane.] The innermost membrane surrounding the fœtus in the womb. It is thin, transparent, soft, and smooth on the inside, but rough on the outside.—2. In bot., a thin semi-transparent, gelatinous substance, in which the embryo of a seed is suspended when it first appears, and on which the embryo is supposed to feed in its early stages.

AMNIOT'IC, a. Relating to the liquor of the amnios.

AMNIOT'IC ACID. See ALLANTOIC ACID.

AMOBE'AN, a. Alternately answering.

AMOBE'UM, n. [Gr. αμοιβαιος, alternate; αμοιβη, change.] A poem in which persons are represented as speaking alternately, as the third and seventh eclogues of Virgil.

AMOLI''TION, n. Removal.

AMO'MUM, n. [Gr. αμωμον: Ar. hamauma, from hamma, to warm or heat; the heating plant.] A genus of plants; all natives of warm climates, and remarkable for their pungency and aromatic properties. It includes the grana paradisi, or grains of paradise. Amomum cardamomum, or reusalmic cardamomum, furnishes cardamom seeds, which are used medicinally as aromatics. True amomum is a round fruit, from the East, of the size of a grape, containing, under a membranous cover, a number of angular seeds of a dark brown colour, in three cells. Of this fruit, ten or twelve grow in a cluster, adhering, without a pedicle, to a woody stalk.

AMONG', } prep. amung', } [Sax. onmang, ongemang, among; gemangan, to mingle; Gr. μιγνυω. See MINGLE.]
AMONGST', } amungst', }

1. In a general or primitive sense, mixed or mingled with; as tares among wheat.—2. Conjoined, or associated with, or making part of the number.

Blessed art thou among women; Luke i.

3. Of the number; as, there is not one among a thousand possessing the like qualities.

AMO'NIAN, a. [from Amon or Hamon, a title of Jupiter, or rather of the sun; Ar. Heb. and Ch. חם, חמה, Ham or Camah, which, as a verb, signifies to heat or warm, and as a noun, heat or the sun; and in Arabic, the supreme God.] Pertaining to Jupiter Ammon, or to his temple and worship in Upper Egypt.

AMORA'DO, n. [L. amor, love, amo, to love. But the word is ill formed.] A lover. [See INAMORATO,] which is chiefly used.

AMORE, n. A name given by Marcgrave to a tribe of fish, of three species, the pixuma, guacu, and tinga. They are found about the shores of South America, and are used for food.

AMORE'ANS, n. A sect of Gemaric doctors or commentators on the Jerusalem Talmud. The Amoreans were followed by the Mishnic doctors, and these by the Sebureans.

AMORET', n. [L. amor, love; Fr. amourette.] A lover; an amorous woman; also a love knot or a trifling love affair.

AM'ORIST, n. [L. amor, love.] A lover; a gallant; an inamorato.

AMORO'SO, n. [It. from amor, love.] A lover; a man enamoured.

AMORO'SA, n. A wanton woman.

AM'OROUS, a. [Fr. amoreux; It. amoroso; from L. amor, love.] 1. Inclined to love; having a propensity to love, or to sexual enjoyment; loving; fond.—2. In love; enamoured.—3. Pertaining or relating to love; produced by love; indicating love; as, amorous delight; amorous airs.

AM'OROUSLY, adv. In an amorous manner; fondly; lovingly.

AM'OROUSNESS, n. The quality of being inclined to love, or to sexual pleasure; fondness; lovingness.

AMORPH'A, n. [Gr. α neg. and μορφη, form.] A genus of plants.

AMORPH'OUS, a. [Gr. α neg. and μορφη, form.] Having no determinate form; of irregular shape; not of any regular figure. It is applied to mineral and other substances which occur in forms not easy to be defined.

AMORPH'Y, n. Irregularity of form; deviation from a determinate shape.

AMORT', adv. [L. mors, mortuus.] In the state of the dead, figuratively, depressed, spiritless.

AMORTIZA''TION, or AMORT'IZEMENT, n. The act or right of alienating lands or tenements to a corporation, which was considered formerly as transferring them to dead hands, as such alienations were mostly made to religious houses for superstitious uses.

AMORT'IZE, v. t. [Norm. amortizer, amortir; Sp. amortizar, to sell in mortmain; It. ammortire, to extinguish, from morte; L. mors, death. See MORTMAIN.] In English law, to alienate in mortmain, that is, to sell to a corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, and their successors. This was considered as selling to dead hands. Lands cannot be alienated in this manner without the king's licence. [See MORTMAIN.]

AMO'TION, n. [L. amotio; amoveo.] Removal.

AMOUNT', v. t. [Fr. monter, to ascend; Norm. amont, upward; from L. mons, a mountain, or its root; W. mynyz.] 1. To rise to or to reach, by an accumulation of particulars, into an aggregate whole; to compose in the whole; as, the interest on the several sums amounts to fifty pounds.—2. To rise, reach, or extend to, in effect, or substance; to result in, by consequence, when all things are considered; as, the testimony of these witnesses amounts to very little.

AMOUNT', n. The sum total of two or more particular sums or quantities; as, the amount of 7 and 9 is 16.—2. The effect, substance, or result; the sum; as, the amount of the testimony is this.

AMOUNT'ING, ppr. Rising to, by accumulation or addition; coming or increasing to; resulting in effect or substance.

AMOUR', n. [Fr., from L. amor, love.] An unlawful connection in love; a love intrigue; an affair of gallantry.

AMOV'AL,† n. [L. amoveo.] Total removal.

AMOVE',† v. t. [L. amoveo, a and moveo, to move.] To remove.

AMOV'ING, a. Moving away.

AM'PELITE, n. [Gr. αμπελος, a vine. The name of an earth used to kill worms on vines. Pliny says it is like bitumen. Lib. 35, 16.] Cannel coal, or candle coal; an inflammable substance of a black colour, compact texture, and resinous lustre, and sufficiently hard to be cut and polished. It burns with a bright flame, of a short duration, and gives but a moderate heat. It is used like jet in making toys. Ampelite is found in France, where husbandmen smear vines with it to kill vermin.

AMPHI. [Gr. αμφι.] A prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying both, about, around.

AMPHIARTHRO'SIS, n. [αμφι and αρθρωσις, articulation.] In anat., a mixed kind of articulation, in which the articular surfaces of bones are united by an intermediate substance in a manner which admits of a small degree of motion.

AMPHIB'IAL, AMPHIB'IAN, AMPHIB'IA, n. [Gr. αμφι, both or about, and βιος, life.] In zool., a term meaning properly an animal capable of living both under water and on land. Its use, therefore, ought to be restricted to such as have both lungs and gills. Four genera of batrachian reptiles do possess such a double respiratory apparatus, the axolotls, menobranchi, sirens, and proteus. These are the only known vertebrated animals which are truly amphibious. In conversation otters, seals, walruses, crocodiles, &c. are called amphibial, though none of them can breathe under water. Linnæus in his arrangement included under this name tortoises, lizards, serpents, frogs, and cartilaginous fishes; but this classification being evidently erroneous has not been adopted by more recent zoologists.

AMPHIB'IOLITE, n. [Gr. αμφιβιος, amphibious, and λιθος, stone.] A fragment of a petrified amphibious animal.

AMPHIBIOLOG'ICAL, a. [Infra.] Pertaining to amphibiology.

AMPHIBIOL'OGY, n. [Gr. αμφι, on both sides, βιος, life, and λογος, discourse.] A discourse or treatise on amphibious animals, or the history and description of such animals.

AMPHIB'IOUS, a. [See AMPHIBIAL.] 1. Having the power of living in two elements, air and water, as frogs crocodiles, beavers, and the like.—2. Of a mixed nature; partaking of two natures; as, an amphibious breed.

AMPHIB'IOUSNESS, n. The quality of being able to live in two elements, or of partaking of two natures.

AMPHIB'IUM, n. That which lives in two elements, as in air and water.

AM'PHIBOLE, n. [Gr. αμφιβολος, equivocal; αμφι and βαλλω.] A name given by Haüy to a species of minerals, including the Tremolite, Hornblend, and Actinolite. Its primitive form is an oblique rhombic prism.

AMPHIB'OLIC, a. Pertaining to amphibole; resembling amphibole, or partaking of its nature and characters.

AMPHIB'OLITE, n. [from Amphibole.]

In geol., amphibolites are trap rocks, the basis of which is amphibole or hornblend.

AMPHIBOLOǴICAL, a. Doubtful; of doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOLOǴICALLY, adv. With a doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOL'OGY, n. [Gr. αμφι, βαλλω and λογος, speech, αμφιβολογια.] A phrase or discourse, susceptible of two interpretations; and hence, a phrase of uncertain meaning. Amphibology arises from the order of the phrase, rather than from the ambiguous meaning of a word which is called equivocation. We have an example in the answer of the oracle to Pyrrhus. "Aio te Romanos vincere posse." Here te and Romanos, may either of them precede or follow vincere posse, and the sense may be either, you may conquer the Romans, or the Romans may conquer you. The English language seldom admits of amphibology.

AMPHIB'OLOUS, a. [Gr. αμφιβολος, αμφι and βαλλω, to strike.] Tossed from one to another; striking each way, with mutual blows. [Lit. us.]

AMPHIB'OLY, n. [Gr. αμφιβολια· αμφι, both ways, and βαλλω, to strike.] Ambiguity of meaning. [Rarely us.]

AM'PHIBRACH, n. [Gr. αμφι, and βραχυς, short.] In poetry, a foot of three syllables, the middle one long, the first and last short; as hăbērĕ, in Latin. In English verse, it is used as the last foot, when a syllable is added to the usual number forming a double rhyme; as,

> The piece, you think, is incorrect, why take it? Pope. Trumbull.

AMPHIBRAN'CHIA, n. (αμφι, and βραγχια, the fauces.) The tonsils and parts adjacent to them.

AM'PHICOME, n. [Gr. αμφι and κομη, hair.] A kind of figured stone of a round shape, but rugged and beset with eminences; called Erotylos, on account of its supposed power of exciting love. Anciently, it was used in divination; but it is little known to the moderns.

AMPHICTYON'IC, a. Pertaining to the august council of Amphictyons.

AMPHIC'TYONS, n. In Grecian his., an assembly or council of deputies from the different states of Greece, supposed to be so called from Amphictyon, the son of Deucalion, but this opinion is probably a fable. Ten or twelve states were represented in this assembly, which sat alternately at Thermopylæ and at Delphi. Each city sent two deputies, one called Hieromnemon and the other Pylagoras. The former inspected the sacrifices and ceremonies of religion; the latter had the charge of deciding causes and differences between private persons. The former was elected by lot; the latter by a plurality of voices. They had an equal right to deliberate and vote in all matters relating to the common interests of Greece.

AM'PHIGENE, n. [Gr. αμφι and γενος.] In mineralogy, another name of the leucite or Vesuvian.

AMPHIHEXAHE'DRAL, a. [Gr. αμφι, and hexahedral.] In crystallography, when the faces of the crystal, counted in two different directions, give two hexahedral outlines, or are found to be six in number.

AMPHIL'OGY, n. [αμφι and λογος, discourse.] Equivocation.

AMPHIM'ACER, n. [Gr. αμφιμακρος, long on both sides.] In ancient poetry, a foot of three syllables, the middle one short and the others long, as in cāstĭtās.

AMPHI'PODA, n. [αμφι and πους a foot.] The third order of Crustaceans in Cuvier's arrangement of the animal kingdom. The bodies of these animals are generally compressed and curved upon the sides; the eyes are sessile and immovable; many of the species are found in springs and rivulets; others are met with in the salt waters.

AM'PHIPODE, n. One of an order of Malacostraceous, Crustaceous animals. See Amphipoda.

AMPHIP'ODOUS, [αμφι and πους, foot.] Having feet on both sides: a term applied to Crustaceans, as the shrimp.

AMPHIP'ROSTILE or AMPHIP'ROSTYLE, n. [αμφι and πρoστυλος, a prostyle.] In arch., used to designate structures having the form of an ancient Greek or Roman parallelogramic temple, with a prostyle or portico on each of its ends or fronts, but with no columns on its sides or flanks.

Amphiprostyle.

AMPHIS'BEN, AMPHIS'BÆNA, } n. [Gr. αμφισβαινα, of αμφις and βαινω, to go; indicating that the animal moves with either end foremost.] A genus of serpents, with the head small, smooth and blunt; the nostrils small, the eyes minute and blackish, and the mouth furnished with small teeth. The body is cylindrical, destitute of scales, and divided into numerous annular segments; the tail obtuse, and scarcely to be distinguished from the head, whence the belief that it moved equally well with either end foremost. There are two species; the fuliginosa, black with white spots, found in Africa and America; and the alba, or white species, found in both the Indies, and generally in ant-hillocks. They feed on ants and earth-worms, and were formerly deemed poisonous; but this opinion is exploded. The aquatic amphisben, Gordius aquaticus, Linn., is an animal resembling a horse-hair, found in water, and moving with either end foremost. The vulgar opinion that this is an animated horse-hair is found to be an error. This hair-worm is generated in the common black beetle, in which the parent worm lays its eggs; and is sometimes found in the earth and on the leaves of trees.

Amphisbæna fuliginosa.

AMPHIS'CII, AMPHIS'CIANS, } n. [Gr. αμφι, on both sides, and σκια, shadow.] In geography, the inhabitants of the tropics, whose shadows, in one part of the year, are cast to the north, and in the other, to the south, according as the sun is in the southern or northern signs.

AM'PHITANE, n. A name given by ancient naturalists to a fossil, called by Dr. Hill Pyricubium. Pliny describes it as of a square figure and a gold colour. Qu. Cubic pyrites.

AMPHITHE'ATRE, or AMPHITHE'ATER, n. [Gr. αμφιθεατρον, of αμφι, about, and θεατρον, theatre, from θεαομαι, to see or look.] 1. An edifice in an oval or circular form, having its area encompassed with rows of seats, rising higher as they recede from the area, on which people used to sit to view the combats of gladiators and of wild beasts, and other sports. The ancient theatre was a semicircle, but exceeding it by a fourth part of its diameter; the amphitheatre was a double theatre, and its longest diameter was to its shortest as 1 1-2 to 1. It was at first of wood, but in the reign of Augustus one was erected of stone. The area or cavea being covered with sand, was called arena. The Coliseum at Rome is the largest of all the ancient amphitheatres, being capable of containing from 50,000 to 80,000 persons.—2. In gardening, a disposition of shrubs and trees in the form of an amphitheatre, on a slope, or forming a slope, by placing the lowest in front. An amphitheatre may also be formed of turf only.

AMPHITHE'ATRAL, a. Resembling an amphitheatre.

AMPHITHEAT'RICAL, a. Pertaining to or exhibited in an amphitheatre.

AM'PHITRITE, n. [Gr. Αμφιτριτη, a goddess of the sea.] A genus of marine animals, of the Linnæan order Mollusca.

AMPHI'TROPAL, a. [Gr. αμφι, round, and τρεπω, to turn.] In bot., a term applied to an embryo which is curved upon itself in such a manner that both its ends are presented to the same point.

AMPHO'DELITE, n. A crystalline mineral. See Scapolite.

AM'PHOR, or AM'PHORA, n. [L. amphora; Gr. αμφορευς or αμφιφορευς: αμφι and φερω.] Among the Greeks and Romans, a liquid measure. The amphora of the Romans contained about forty-eight sextaries, equal to seven gallons and a pint, English wine measure. The Grecian or Attic amphor contained about a third more. This was also, among the Romans, a dry measure of about three bushels. Among the Venetians, it is a liquid measure of sixteen quarts. This name was formerly used in England; but the capacity of the Sax. ambra is not certainly known.

Roman Amphoræ.

AM'PLE, a. [Fr. ample; L. amplus.] 1. Large; wide; spacious; extended; as, ample room. This word carries with it the sense of room or space fully sufficient for the use intended.—2. Great in bulk, or size; as, an ample tear.—3. Liberal; unrestrained; without parsimony; fully sufficient; as, ample provision for the table; ample justice.—4. Liberal; magnificent; as, ample promises.—5. Diffusive; not brief or contracted; as, an ample narrative.

AM'PLENESS, n. Largeness; spaciousness; sufficiency; abundance

AMPLEXA'TION,† n. [L. amplexari.] An embrace.

AMPLEX'ICAUL, or AMPLEXICAUL'ENT, a. [L. amplexor, to embrace, of amb, about, and plico, plexus, to fold, and caulis, καυλος, a stem.] In bot., nearly surrounding or embracing the stem, as the base of a leaf. The Papaver somniferum and Carduus Marianus have amplexicaul leaves.

Amplexicaul leaf.

AM'PLIATE, v. t. [L. amplio. See AMPLE.] To enlarge; to make greater; to extend. [Lit. us.]

AMPLIA'TION, n. Enlargement; amplification; diffuseness. [Lit. us.]—2. In Roman antiquity, a deferring to pass sentence; a postponement of a decision, to obtain further evidence.

AMPLIF'ICATE, v. t. [L. amplifico.] To enlarge; to amplify.

AMPLIFICA'TION, n. [L. amplificatio.] 1. Enlargement; extension.—2. In rhetoric, diffusive description or discussion; exaggerated representation; copious argument, intended to present the subject in every view, or in the strongest light; diffuse narrative, or a dilating upon all the particulars of a subject; a description given in more words than are necessary, or an illustration by various examples and proofs.

AM'PLIFIED, pp. Enlarged; extended; diffusively treated.

AM'PLIFIER, n. One who amplifies or enlarges; one who treats a subject diffusively, to exhibit it in the strongest light.

AM'PLIFY, v. t. [Fr. amplifier; L. amplifico; of amplus and facio, to make large.] 1. To enlarge; to augment; to increase or extend, in a general sense, applied to material or immaterial things.—2. In rhetoric, to enlarge in discussion or by representation; to treat copiously, so as to present the subject in every view, and in the strongest lights.—3. To enlarge by addition; to improve or extend; as, to amplify the sense of an author by a paraphrase.

AM'PLIFY, v. i. To speak largely or copiously; to be diffuse in argument or description; to dilate upon; often followed by on; as, to amplify on the several topics of discourse.—2. To exaggerate; to enlarge by representation or description; as,

Homer amplifies—not invents. Pope.

AM'PLIFYING, ppr. Enlarging; exaggerating; diffusively treating.

AM'PLITUDE, n. [L. amplitudo, from amplus, large.] 1. Largeness; extent, applied to bodies; as, the amplitude of the earth.—2. Largeness; extent of capacity or intellectual powers; as, amplitude of mind.—3. Extent of means or power; abundance; sufficiency.

Amplitude, in astr., is an arch of the horizon intercepted between the east or west point, and the centre of the sun or star at its rising or setting. At the rising of a star, the amplitude is eastern or ortive; at the setting it is western, occiduous, or occasive. It is also northern or southern, when north or south of the equator.

Amplitude of the range, in projectiles, is the horizontal line subtending the path of a body thrown, or the line which measures the distance it has moved.

Magnetical amplitude, is the arch of the horizon between the sun or a star, at rising or setting, and the east or west point of the horizon, by the compass. The difference between this and the true amplitude is the variation of the compass.

AM'PLY, adv. Largely; liberally; fully; sufficiently; copiously; in a diffusive manner.

AMPUL'LA, n. [Lat.] In antiq., a vessel bellying out like a jug that contained unctions for the bath; also a vessel for drinking at table. In anat., the term is applied to the dilated part of the membranaceous semicircular canals in the ear. In bot it signifies a small membranaceous bag attached to the roots, and the immersed leaves of some aquatic plants, as in the lemna, or duck-weed.

Ampulla.

AMPULLÆ, is a name also given to the little spongy bodies or spongioles, by which the extremities of the small fibres of roots are terminated, and which serve as mouths to absorb the juices necessary for the life and nourishment of the root. The figure exhibits these ampullæ, as seen by the aid of a microscope.

Ampullæ.

AMPULLA'CEOUS, a. Like a bottle or inflated bladder.

AMPULLA'RIA, n. A genus of freshwater spiral univalve shells which inhabits the rivers and ponds of India, Africa, and South America. They are of a globular, or rather depressed form, and the animals are somewhat similar to the common pond-snail.

AM'PUTATE, v. t. [L. amputo, of amb, about, and puto, to prune.] 1. To prune branches of trees or vines; to cut off.—2. To cut off a limb or other part of an animal body; a term of surgery.

AM'PUTATED, pp. Cut off; separated from the body.

AM'PUTATING, ppr. Cutting off a limb or part of the body.

AMPUTA'TION, n. [L. amputatio.] The act or operation of cutting off a limb or some part of the body. In the case of a tumour, the term excision or extirpation is generally used.

AMUCK, or AMOK, n. An Indian term for slaughter, which, from the use made of it by the Malays, has become notorious. Their constant use of opium contributes to infuriate them, and when maddened by its effects, they rush out with daggers in their hands, yelling, Amuck, Amuck, (i. e. kill, kill); whence the common expression to run a muck.

AM'ULET, n. [L. amuletum; Fr. amulette, from Lat. amolior, amolitus, to remove.] Something worn as a remedy or preservative against evils or mischief, such as diseases and witchcraft. Amulets, in days of ignorance, were common. They consisted of certain stones, metals, or plants; sometimes of words, characters, or sentences, arranged in a particular order. They were appended to the neck or body. Among some nations they are still in use.

AMULET'IC, a. Pertaining to an amulet.

AMUSE, v. t. (s as z.) [Fr. amuser, to stop or keep at bay, to detain; from muser, to loiter or trifle; It. musare, to gaze or stand idle; Ger. müssig, idle; Qu Gr. μυζω; Lat. musso.] 1. To entertain the mind agreeably; to occupy or detain attention with agreeable objects, whether by singing, conversation, or a show of curiosities. Dr Johnson remarks, that amuse implies something less lively than divert, and less important than please. Hence it is often said, we are amused with trifles.—2. To detain; to engage the attention by hope or expectation; as, to amuse one by flattering promises.

AMUSED, pp. (s as z.) Agreeably entertained; having the mind engaged by something pleasing.

AMUSEMENT, n. (s as z.) That which amuses, detains, or engages the mind; entertainment of the mind; pastime; a pleasurable occupation of the senses, or that which furnishes it, as dancing, sports, or music.

AMUSER, n. (s as z.) One who amuses, or affords an agreeable entertainment to the mind.

AMUSING, ppr. or a. (s as z.) Entertaining; giving moderate pleasure to the mind, so as to engage it; pleasing.

AMUSINGLY, adv. (s as z.) In an amusing manner.

AMU'SIVE, a. That has the power to amuse or entertain the mind.

AMU'SIVELY, adv. In a manner to give amusement.

A'MY, n. [Fr. ami.] In law, the friend or guardian to whom an infant is entrusted.

AMYG'DALATE, a. [L. amygdalus, an almond.] Made of almonds.

AMYG'DALATE, n. An emulsion made of almonds; milk of almonds.—2. A salt whose acid is the amygdalic.

AMYGDAL'IC ACID, n. An acid obtained from the bitter almond.

AMYG'DALINE, a. Pertaining to or resembling the almond.

AMYG'DALINE, n. A crystalline substance obtained from the kernel of the bitter almond.

AMYGDALI'NIC ACID, n. An acid discovered by Wöhler and Liebig. It is obtained by dissolving amygdaline in barytic water, and boiling the solution as long as ammonia is evolved. It is a colourless, transparent, amorphous mass, having a pleasant acid taste.

AMYG'DALITE, n. A plant; a species of spurge, with leaves resembling those of the almond.

AMYG'DALOID, n. [Gr. αμυγδαλια, an almond, and ειδος, form; G. mandelstein, almond-stone.] Toad-stone; a compound rock, consisting of a basis of basalt, greenstone, or some other variety of trap, imbedding nodules of various minerals, particularly calcareous spar, quartz, agate, zeolite, chlorite, &c. When the imbedded minerals are detached, it is porous like lava.

AMYG'DALOIDAL, or AMYG'DALOID, a. Pertaining to amygdaloid.—2. Almond-shaped.

AMYG'DALUS, n. [Gr. αμυγδαλη, an almond.] A genus of plants of the class Icosandria, and order Monogynia, and nat. order Rosaceæ. The almond-tree.

AMYLA'CEOUS, n. [L. amylum, starch, of α priv. and μυλη, a mill, being formerly made without grinding.] Pertaining to starch, or the farinaceous part of grain; resembling starch.

AMYL'IC AC'ID, n. A volatile acid obtained from starch.

AM'YLIN, n. [L. amylum; Gr. αμυλον: αμυλος, unground, α and μυλη, mill.] The insoluble portion of starch which constitutes the outer covering of the sphericles.

AM'YRALDISM, n. In church hist., the doctrine of universal grace, as explained by Amyraldus, or Amyrault, of France, in the seventeenth century. He taught that God desires the happiness of all men, and that none are excluded by a divine decree, but that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance to improve this power.

AMYRI'DEÆ, n. A natural order of plants, consisting of tropical trees, the leaves, bark, and fruit of which, abound in fragrant resin.

AMYZ'TLI, n. A Mexican name of the sea lion, an amphibious quadruped, inhabiting the shores and rivers of America on the Pacific ocean. Its body is three feet in length, and its tail two feet. It has a long snout, short legs, and crooked nails. Its skin is valued for the length and softness of its hair.

AM'ZEL, n. In ornith., a bird of the merula or blackbird kind; called in Derbyshire the rock ouzel.

AN, a. [Sax. an, ane, one; D. een; Ger. ein; Fr. on, un, une; It. uno, una; L. unus, una, unum; Gr. εν: W. un, yn.] One; noting an individual, either definitely, known, certain, specified, or understood; or indefinitely, not certain, known, or specified. Definitely, as "Noah built an ark of Gopher wood:" "Paul was an eminent apostle." Indefinitely, as "Bring me an orange." Before a consonant the letter n is dropped, as, a man; but our ancestors wrote an man, an king. This letter represents an definitely or indefinitely. Definitely, as "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God;" Ex. vi. Indefinitely, as "The province of a judge is to decide controversies." An being the same word as one, should not be used with it; "such an one," is tautology; but custom has sanctioned its use. Although an, a and one, are the same word, and always have the same sense, yet by custom, an and a are used exclusively as a definitive adjective, and one is used in numbering. Where our ancestors wrote an, twa, thry, we now use one, two, three. So an and a are never used except with a noun; but one, like other adjectives, is sometimes used without its noun, and as a substitute for it: "One is at a loss to assign a reason for such conduct."

An is to be used before a vowel and before a silent h, as an hour. It is also used before h, when the accent of the word falls on any syllable except the first, as in historian and historiographer. An or a, as an initial syllable, is often used for a privative, as in anarchy, agalaxy.

AN, in old English authors, signifies if; as, "an it please your honour." So in Gr. αν, or εαν, Ar. Sam. and L. an, if or whether; Ir. an. Ch. אן, an, or אין, aeen, if, whether. It is probably an imperative, like if, gif, give. Qu. Sax. annan, or anan, to give.

A'NA, ăă, or ă. [Gr. ανα.] In medical prescriptions, it signifies an equal quantity of the several ingredients; as, wine and honey, ana, ăă or ă oz. ii. that is, of wine and honey each two ounces.

A'NA. A prefix in words, of Greek origin, implying repetition, upward motion, inversion, distribution, parallelism, or proportion. As a termination, it denotes a collection of memorable sayings. Thus, Scaligerana, is a book containing the sayings of Scaliger. It was used by the Romans, as in Collectaneus, collected, gathered.

ANABAP'TISM, n. [See ANABAPTIST.] The doctrine of the Anabaptists.

ANABAP'TIST, n. [Gr. ανα, again, and βαπτιστης, a baptist.] One who holds the doctrine of the baptism of adults, or of the invalidity of infant baptism, and the necessity of rebaptization in an adult age. One who maintains that baptism ought always to be performed by immersion.

ANABAPTIST'IC, ANABAPTIST'ICAL, } a. Relating to the Anabaptists, or to their doctrines.

ANABAP'TISTRY, n. The sect of Anabaptists. [Little used.]

ANABAPTIZE',† v. t. To rebaptize.

ANABRO'SIS, n. A wasting away.

ANABIBAZ'ON, n. In astron., a name given to the northern node of the moon or dragon's head.

AN'ACA, n. A species of paroquet, about the size of a lark; the crown of the head is a dark red, the upper part of the neck, sides, back, and wings are green.

ANACAMP'TIC, a. [Gr. ανα and καμπτω, to bend.] 1. Reflecting or reflected; a word formerly applied to that part of optics which treats of reflection; the same as what is now called catoptric. [See CATOPTRICS.]—2. Anacamptic sounds, among the Greeks, were sounds produced by reflection, as in echoes; or such as proceeded downward from acute to grave.

ANACAMP'TICS, n. The doctrine of reflected light. [See CATOPTRICS.]

ANACÄR'DIUM, n. The name of a genus of plants, a species of which produces the cashew-nut, or marking nut, from which a thickish, red, acrid, inflammable liquor is produced, that when used in marking, turns black, and is very durable.

ANACATHAR'TIC, a. [Gr. ανα, and καθαρσις, purging. [See CATHARTIC.] Throwing upward; cleansing by exciting vomiting, expectoration, &c.

ANACATHAR'TIC, n. A medicine which excites discharges by the mouth, or nose, as expectorants, emetics, sternutatories, and masticatories.

ANACH'ORET. See ANCHORET.

ANACH'RONISM, n. [Gr. ανα, and χρονος, time.] An error in computing time; any error in chronology, by which events are misplaced.

ANACHRONIS'TIC, a. Erroneous in date; containing an anachronism.

ANA'CLASIS, n. [Gr. ανακλασις, to bend back.] In surg., a recurvature of any part, as of a joint or fractured limb.

ANACLAS'TIC, a. [Gr. ανα and κλασις, a breaking, from κλαω, to break.] Refracting; breaking the rectilinear course of light.

Anaclastic glasses, sonorous glasses or phials, which are flexible, and emit a vehement noise by means of the human breath; called also vexing glasses, from the fright which their resilience occasions. They are low phials with flat bellies, like inverted tunnels, and with very thin convex bottoms. By drawing out a little air, the bottom springs into a concave form with a smart crack; and by breathing or blowing into them, the bottom, with a like noise, springs into its former convex form.

ANACLAS'TICS, n. That part of optics which treats of the refraction of light, commonly called dioptrics, which see.

ANACLI'SIS, n. [ανακλινω, to recline.] Among physicians, the attitude of a sick person in bed, which affords important indications in several cases.

ANACOENO'SIS, or ANACŒNO'SIS, n. [Gr. ανακοινωσις: ανα and κοινος, common.] A figure of rhetoric, by which a speaker applies to his opponents for their opinion on the point in debate.

ANACOLU'THON, n. [ανακολουθον, not following.] In gram. and rhet., a want of coherency; want of sequence in a sentence.

ANACOND'A, n. A name given in Ceylon to a large snake, a species of Boa, which is said to devour travellers. Its flesh is excellent food.

ANACREON'TIC, a. Pertaining to Anacreon, a Greek poet, whose odes and epigrams are celebrated for their delicate, easy, and graceful air, and for their exact imitation of nature. His verse consists of three feet and a half, usually spondees and iambuses, sometimes anapæsts; as in this line of Horace—

"Lydia, dic per omnes."

ANACREON'TIC, n. A poem composed in the manner of Anacreon.

AN'ADEM, n. [Gr. ανάδημα.] A garland or fillet. A chaplet or crown of flowers.

ANADIPLO'SIS, n. [Gr. ανα, again, and διπλοος, double.] Duplication, a figure in rhetoric and poetry, consisting in the repetition of the last word or words in a line or clause of a sentence, in the beginning of the next; as "He retained his virtues amidst all his misfortunes, misfortunes which no prudence could foresee or prevent."

AN'ADROM, n. [See below.] A fish that ascends rivers.

ANAD'ROMOUS, a. [Gr. ανα, upward, and δρομος, course.] Ascending; a word applied to such fish as pass from the sea into fresh waters, at stated seasons.

ANÆ'MIA, n. [Gr. α priv. and αιμα, blood.] Exsanguinity; deficiency of blood, a disease.

ANÆSTHE'SIA, n. [Gr. αναισθησια, from α priv. and αισθανομαι, to feel.] Loss of the sense of touch; diminished or lost sense of feeling.

AN'AGLYPH, n. [Gr. ανα, and γλυφω, to engrave.] An ornament made by sculpture.

ANAGLYP'TIC, or ANAGLYPHI'C, a. Relating to the art of carving, engraving, enchasing, or embossing plate, or any work in relief. This art when applied to stone, is also called cameo. The opposite kind of work, which is done by engraving or indenting, is called diaglyphic or intaglio.

Anaglyph

ANAGNO'SIS, n. [Gr.] Recognition; the unravelling of a plot in dramatic action.

AN'AGOGE, AN'AGOGY, n. [Gr. αναγωγη, of ανα, upward, and αγωγη, a leading, from αγω.] An elevation of mind to things celestial; the spiritual meaning or application of words; also the application of the types and allegories of the Old Testament to subjects of the New. Anagogy, in med., signifies the return of humours, or the rejection of blood from the lungs by the mouth.

ANAGOGET'ICAL, a. Mysterious.

ANAGOG'ICAL, a. Mysterious; elevated; spiritual; as, the rest of the sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven.

ANAGOG'ICALLY, adv. In a mysterious sense; with religious elevation.

ANAGOG'ICS, n. Mysterious considerations.

AN'AGRAM, n. [Gr. ανα, and γραμμα, a letter.] In its proper sense, the letters of one or several words read backwards; thus, evil is an anagram of live. In a wider sense, it means a transposition of the letters of a word or sentence, to form a new word or phrase. Thus Galenus becomes angelus; William Noy, (attorney-general to Charles I., a laborious man,) may be turned into I moyl in law. Dr. Burney's anagram of Horatio Nelson, is one of the happiest. Honor est a Nilo

ANAGRAMMAT'IC, ANAGRAMMAT'ICAL, a. Making an anagram.

ANAGRAMMAT'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of an anagram.

ANAGRAM'MATISM, n. The act or practice of making anagrams.

ANAGRAM'MATIST, n. A maker of anagrams.

ANAGRAM'MATIZE, v. i. To make anagrams.

AN'AGRAPH, n. An inventory; commentary.

AN'AGROS, n. A measure of grain in Spain, containing something less than two bushels.

A'NAL, a. [L. anus.] Pertaining to the anus; as, the anal fin. The anal fin in fishes is the fin placed between the vent and tail, which expands perpendicularly.

ANAL'CIM, ANAL'CIME, n. Cubic zeolite, found in aggregated or cubic crystals. This mineral is generally crystallized, but is also found amorphous, and in reniform, mammillary, laminated, or radiated masses. It is of frequent occurrence in trap rocks. It melts under the blowpipe, into a semi-transparent glass. By friction, it acquires a weak electricity; hence its name, Gr. αναλκις, weak.

AN'ALECTS, n. [Gr ανα, and λεγω, to collect.] A collection of short essays or remarks; extracts from different works.

AN'ALEMMA, n. [Gr. αναλημμα, altitude.] 1. In geom., a projection of the sphere on the plane of the meridian, orthographically made by straight lines, circles, and ellipsis, the eye being supposed at an infinite distance, and in the east or west points of the horizon. Also,—2. An instrument of wood or brass on which this kind of projection is drawn, with a horizon and cursor fitted to it, in which the solstitial colure, and all the circles parallel to it, will be concentric circles; all circles oblique to the eye will be ellipses; and all circles whose planes pass through the eye, will be right lines.

ANALEP'SIS, or ANALEP'SY, n. [from Gr. αναλαμβανω, to restore.] The augmentation or nutrition of an emaciated body; a species of epileptic attack of sudden and frequent recurrence; also, a recovery of strength after sickness.

ANALEP'TIC, a Corroborating; invigorating; giving strength after disease.

ANALEP'TIC, n. A medicine which gives strength, and aids in restoring a body to health after sickness; a restorative.

ANAL'OGAL,† a Analogous.

ANALOG'ICAL, a. Having analogy; used by way of analogy; bearing some relation. Thus analogical reasoning is reasoning from some similitude which things known bear to things unknown. An analogical word is one which carries with it some relation to the original idea. Thus the word firm primarily denotes solidity or compactness in a material body; and by analogy, when used of the mind, it conveys the idea of qualities having a similitude to the solidity of bodies, that is, fixedness or immoveability.

ANALOG'ICALLY, adv In an analogical manner; by way of similitude, relation, or agreement. Thus, to reason analogically, is to deduce inferences from some agreement or relation which things bear to each other.

ANALOG'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy.

ANAL'OGISM, n. [Gr. αναλογισμος.] 1. An argument from the cause to the effect.—2. Investigation of things by the analogy they bear to each other.

ANAL'OGIST, n. One who adheres to analogy.

ANAL'OGIZE, v t. To explain by analogy; to form some resemblance between different things; to consider a thing with regard to its analogy to something else.

ANAL'OGOUS, a. Having analogy; bearing some resemblance or proportion; followed by to; as, there is something in the exercise of the mind analogous to that of the body.

ANAL'OGOUSLY, adv. In an analogous manner.

AN'ALOGUE, n. (an'alog.) [Gr. αναλογος.] 1. A word corresponding with another; an analogous term.—2. Any body which corresponds with, or bears great resemblance to, some other body. Thus, among geol., a recent shell of the same species with a fossil shell, is said to be an analogue of the latter.

ANAL'OGY, n. [Gr. αναλογια, of ανα, and λογος, ratio, proportion.] 1. An agreement or likeness between things in some circumstances or effects, when the things are otherwise entirely different. Learning enlightens the mind, because it is to the mind what light is to the eye, enabling it to discover things before hidden. When the things which have an analogy follow a preposition, that preposition must be between or betwixt; as, there is an analogy between plants and animals, or between customs. When one of the things precedes a verb, and the other follows, the preposition used must be to or with; as, a plant has some analogy to or with an animal.—2. With grammarians, analogy is a conformity of words to the genius, structure, or general rules of a language. Thus the general rule in English is, that the plural of a noun ends in es; therefore all nouns which have that plural termination, have an analogy, or are formed in analogy with other words of a like kind. In the inductive philosophy, when one system of events or appearances is similar to another, and when we infer that the causes in these two systems are also similar, we are said to reason from analogy. Such reasonings will be more or less conclusive, according as the similarity is more or less considerable. Analogical reasoning is essential in inductive philosophy, though it must be used with caution. By a legitimate use of analogy, Newton established his theory of universal gravitation Analogy in math., denotes a similitude of ratios.

ANAL'YSIS, n. [Gr. αναλυσις, of ανα, and λυσις, a loosing, or resolving, from λυω, to loosen. See LOOSE.] 1. The tactitious separation of a compound body into its constituent parts; a resolving; as, an analysis of water, air or oil, to discover its elements.—2. A consideration of any thing in its separate parts; an examination of the different parts of a subject, each separately; as, the words which compose a sentence, the notes of a tune, or the simple propositions which enter into an argument. It is opposed to synthesis.

In math., analysis is the resolving of problems by algebraic equations. The analysis of finite quantities is otherwise called algebra, or specious arithmetic. The analysis of infinites is the method of fluxions, or the differential calculus. The ancient analysis was exhibited only in geometry. It proceeded from the thing sought as taken for granted, through all its consequences, to something really known. It was thus opposed to synthesis, in which the process was reversed. [See SYNTHESIS.] Euclid's data afford the best examples of the ancient analysis. The synthetical method is exhibited in the First Six Books of Euclid's Elements. Analysis, in chem., is the decomposition of bodies, as vegetables and minerals, to discover their component parts or elements. The dissection of the human body for the purpose of examining its structure and parts, and which is termed anatomy, is an analytical process. In logic, analysis is the tracing of things to their source, and the resolving of knowledge into its original principles.—3. A syllabus, or table of the principal heads of a continued discourse, disposed in their natural order.—4. A brief, methodical illustration of the principles of a science. In this sense it is nearly synonymous with synopsis.

AN'ALYST, n. One who analyzes, or is versed in analysis.

ANALYT'IC, ANALYT'ICAL, a. Pertaining to analysis; that resolves into first principles; that separates into parts or original principles; that resolves a compound body or subject; as, an analytical experiment in chemistry, or an analytical investigation. It is opposed to synthetic.

ANALYT'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of analysis; by way of separating a body into its constituent parts, or a subject into its principles

ANALYT'ICS, n. The science of analysis. It is also applied to algebra, which is nothing else but a general analysis of pure mathematics. [See ANALYSIS]

ANALYZ'ABLE, a. That can be analyzed.

ANALYZ'ABLENESS, n. The state of being analyzable.

AN'ALYZE, v. t. [Gr. ἀ λυω. See ANALYSIS] To resolve a body into its elements; to separate a compound subject into its parts or propositions, for the purpose of an examination of each separately; as, to analyze a fossil substance; to analyze an action to ascertain its morality

AN'ALYZED, pp. Resolved into its constituent parts or principles, for examination.

AN'ALYZER, n. One who analyzes; that which analyzes or has the power to analyze.

AN'ALYZING, ppr. Resolving into elements, constituent parts, or first principles.

ANAMNE'SIS, n. [Gr. ανα, and μνησις, remembrance.] A figure, in rhet. It calls to remembrance something omitted.

ANAMNES'TIC, a. That aids the memory.

ANAMOR'PHOSIS, ANAMOR'PHOSY, n [Gr ανα, and μορφωσις, formation.] 1. In perspective drawings, a deformed or distorted portrait or figure, which, in one point of view is confused or unintelligible, and in another, is an exact and regular representation; or confused to the naked eye, but reflected from a plane or curved mirror, appearing regular, and in right proportion. — 2. In bot., any part of a plant in which there is an unusual degree of cellular development.

Anamorphosis

ANA'NAS, n. The name of a species of Bromelia, commonly called the pineapple, from the similarity of its shape to the cones of firs and pines.

ANAN'DROUS, a. [Gr. α without, and ανηρ, Genit. ανδρος, a male or stamen.] In bot., a term applied to flowers that are destitute of a stamen; female flowers.

AN'APEST, or ANAPÆST, n. [Gr. ανα, and παιω, to strike.] In poetry, a foot consisting of three syllables, the first two short, the last long; the reverse of the dactyl; as,

Căn ă bōsŏm sŏ gĕntlĕ rēmāin
Unmoved when her Corydon sighs?
Shenstone.

ANAPEST'IC, or ANAPÆSTIC, n. The anapestic measure.

ANAPEST'IC, or ANAPÆSTIC, a. Pertaining to an anapest; consisting of anapestic feet

ANAPH'ORA, n. [Gr. from αναφερω.] 1. A figure in rhetoric, when the same word or words are repeated at the beginning of two or more succeeding verses or clauses of a sentence; as, "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?"— 2. Among physicians, the discharge of blood or purulent matter by the mouth.

ANAPHRODI SIA, n [Gr. α priv. and αφροδισια, sexual intercourse] Impotence.

ANAPLEROT'IC, a. [Gr. αναπληροω to fill.] Filling up; supplying or renovating flesh.

ANAPLEROT'IC, n. A medicine which renews flesh or wasted parts.

AN'ARCH, n. [See ANARCHY] The author of confusion; one who excites revolt.

ANARCH'IC, ANARCH'ICAL, a. Without rule or government; in a state of confusion; applied to a state or society. Fielding uses anarchial, a word of less difficult pronunciation.

AN'ARCHISM, n. Confusion.

AN'ARCHIST, n. An anarch; one who excites revolt, or promotes disorder in a state

AN'ARCHY, n. [Gr. αναρχια, of α priv. and αρχη, rule.] Want of government; a state of society when there is no law or supreme power, or when the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity; political confusion.

ANAR'HICHAS, n. The sea-wolf, or cat fish, a genus of ravenous fish, of the order of Apodals, found in the northern seas.

A'NAS, n. [L.] A genus of water-fowl, of the order Anseres. The species are very numerous.

ANASAR'CA, n. [Gr. ανα, in or between, and σαρξ, flesh.] An effusion of water into the cellular substance, occasioning a soft, pale, inelastic swelling of the skin.

ANASAR'COUS, a. Belonging to anasarca, or dropsy; dropsical.

ANASTAL'TIC, a. [Gr. αναστελλω, to close.] In med., astringent, styptic.

ANA'STASIS, n. [From ανιστημι, to rise again.] 1. In med., a recovery from sickness; a restoration to health.— 2. A translation of humours to a superior part.

ANASTOMAT'IC, a. Having the quality of removing obstructions.

ANAS'TOMOSE, v. i. (s as z.) [Gr. ανα, and στομα, mouth.] To inosculate; to unite the mouth of one vessel with another, as the arteries with the veins.

ANASTOM'OSY, ANASTOMO'SIS, n. The inosculation of vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another, as an artery into another artery, or a vein into a vein.

ANASTOMOT'IC, a. Pertaining to anastomosis.

ANASTOMOT'IC, n. A medicine supposed to have the power of opening the mouths of vessels, and promoting circulation, such as cathartics, deobstruents and sudorifics.

ANAS'TROPHE, ANAS'TROPHY, n. [Gr. αναστροφη, a conversion or inversion.] In rhet., and gram., an inversion of the natural order of words, as, saxa per et scopulos, for per saxa et scopulos.

AN'ATASE, n. [Gr. ανατασις, extension, so named from the length of its crystals.] Octahedrite; octahedral oxide of titanium; a mineral that shows a variety of colours by reflected light, from indigo blue to reddish brown, It is usually crystallized in acute, elongated, pyramidical octahedrons.

ANATH'EMA, n. [Gr. αναθεμα, from ανατιθημι, to place behind, backward, or at a distance, to separate.] 1. Excommunication with curses. Hence, a curse or denunciation by ecclesiastical authority, accompanying excommunication. This species of excommunication was practised in the ancient churches, against notorious offenders; all churches were warned not to receive them; all magistrates and private persons were admonished not to harbour or maintain them, and priests were enjoined not to converse with them, or attend their funeral There are two kinds of anathemas, judiciary and abjuratory. The former is pronounced by a council, pope, or bishop; the latter is the act of a convert who anathematizes the heresy which he abjures.- 2. In heathen mythol, an offering or present made to some deity, and hung up in a temple. Whenever a person quitted his employment, he set apart, or dedicated his tools to his patron-deity. Persons who had escaped danger remarkably, or been otherwise very fortunate, testified their gratitude by some offering to their deity. Among the Greeks, αναθημα was used to signify a person or thing separated or devoted to destruction; a curse; and αναθημα to signify a consecrated gift or offering.

ANATHEMAT'ICAL, a. Pertaining to anathema.

ANATHEMAT'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of anathema.

ANATHEMATIZA'TION, n. The act of anathematizing.

ANATH'EMATIZE, v. t. To excommunicate with a denunciation of curses; to pronounce an anathema against.

ANATH'EMATIZED, pp. Excommunicated with curses.

ANATH'EMATIZING, ppr. Pronouncing an anathema.

ANATIF'EROUS, a. [L. anas, a duck, and fero, to produce.] Producing ducks.

ANAT'OCISM, n. [L. anatocismus, from Gr. ανα, again, and τοκος, usury.] Interest upon interest; the taking of compound interest; or the contract by which such interest is secured. [Rarely used.]

ANATOM'ICAL, a. Belonging to anatomy or dissection; produced by or according to the principles of anatomy or natural structure of the body; relating to the parts of the body when dissected or separated.

ANATOM'ICALLY, adv. In an anatomical manner; by means of dissection; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

ANAT'OMIST, n. One who dissects bodies; more generally, one who is skilled in the art of dissection, or versed in the doctrine and principles of anatomy.

ANAT'OMIZE, v. t. To dissect an animal; to divide into the constituent parts, for the purpose of examining each by itself; to lay open the interior structure of the parts of a body or subject; as, to anatomize an animal or plant; to anatomize an argument.

ANAT'OMIZED, pp. Dissected, as an animal body.

ANAT'OMIZING, ppr. Dissecting.

ANAT'OMY, n. [Gr. ἀνατομή, of ἀνά, through, and τομή, a cutting.] 1. The art of dissecting, or artificially separating the different parts of an animal body, to discover their situation, structure, and economy.—The object of anatomy, taken in its widest sense, is to ascertain the structure of organized bodies, and accordingly it comprehends the whole range of the organic kingdom. That branch which treats of the structure of plants is called vegetable anatomy, and that which treats of the structure of animals is called animal anatomy. Animal anatomy is divided into comparative and human; comparative anatomy includes an account of the structure of all classes of animals, excepting that of man; human anatomy is restricted to an account of the structure of man only. Artificial anatomy, the art of making models in wax, or other materials, to illustrate the healthy or diseased structure of parts.—2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection; as, a physician understands anatomy.—3. The act of dividing any thing, corporeal or intellectual, for the purpose of examining its parts; as, the anatomy of a plant, or of a discourse. —4. The body stripped of its integuments and muscles; a skeleton, or the corporeal frame of bones entire, without the skin, flesh and vessels: an improper use of the word, and vulgar.—5. Ironically, a meagre person.

ANATREP'TIC, a. [Gr. ἀνατρέπω, to overturn.] Overthrowing; defeating; prostrating: a word applied to the dialogues of Plato, which represent a complete defeat in the gymnastic exercises.

AN'ATRON, n. [from Gr. νίτρον, nitre.] 1. Soda or mineral fixed alkali.—2. Spume or glass gall, a scum which rises upon melted glass, in the furnace, and when taken off, dissolves in the air, and coagulates into common salt.—3. The salt which collects on the walls of vaults.

ANA'TROPOUS, a. In bot., applied to a seed in which the embryo is inverted, so that its base corresponds to the apex of the seed. It is of common occurrence in the vegetable kingdom.

AN'BURY, n. An excrescence in some plants of the natural order Cruciferæ, and chiefly in the turnip, produced by the puncture and depository of the eggs of an insect.

AN'CEPS, a. [L.] Two-edged, having two sharp edges; a term applied to the stems and leaves of plants; as in the Iris, gramineæ, and leaves of the Typha latifolia.

AN'CESTOR, n. [Fr. ancestres, ancêtres; L. antecessor, of ante, before, and cedo, to go.] One from whom a person descends, either by the father or mother. An ancestor precedes in the order of nature or blood; a predecessor, in the order of office. Ancestor, in Scots law, is one from whom a landed estate is derived, and who is represented by the person in possession.

ANCESTO'RIAL, a. Ancestral.

ANCES'TRAL, a. Relating or belonging to ancestors; claimed or descending from ancestors; as, an ancestral estate.

ANCES'TRESS, n. A female ancestor.

AN'CESTRY, n. A series of ancestors, or progenitors; lineage, or those who compose the line of natural descent. Hence birth or honourable descent.

AN'CHILOPS, n. [Gr. αἰγίλωψ, from αἴξ, a goat, and ὤψ, an eye.] The goat's eye; an abscess in the inner angle of the eye; an incipient fistula lachrymalis.

AN'CHOR, n. [L. anchora; Gr. ἄγκυρα: Ir. ankaire, ancoir or ingir; Fr. ancre.] 1. An instrument for holding a ship or other vessel at rest in the water, where the depth does not preclude its use. In former times anchors were merely large stones, baskets of stones, &c. The anchor now used is iron formed with a strong shank c, at one end of which are two arms b b, terminating in flukes a a; at the other end of the shank is the stock d d, supplied with a ring, to which a cable can be attached. The principal use of the stock is, to cause the arms fall so as one of the flukes shall imbed itself firmly in the holding ground. Anchors are of various sizes. The largest and heaviest is the sheet anchor. Then come the best bower, the small bower, the spare anchor, the stream anchor, and the kedge anchor. —Floating anchor, an implement, variously constructed, for being sunk below the swell of the sea, where there is no anchorage, to prevent a vessel from drifting. —Mooring anchor, a large heavy mass placed in bottom of the water, in a harbour or roadstead, to which ships may be attached by a cable. Sometimes it consists merely of several large stones bound together, and sometimes it is made of iron in various forms. In seamen's language, the anchor comes home, when it is dislodged from its bed, so as to drag by the violence of the wind, sea, or current.—Foul anchor. [See FOUL.]—At anchor, is when a ship rides by her anchor. Hence, to lie, or ride at anchor.—To cast anchor, or to anchor, is to let go an anchor, to keep a ship at rest.—To weigh anchor, is to heave or raise the anchor out of the ground.—The anchor drags, the effort of making the anchor come home, so as to drag it along the ground.—To cat the anchor, is when the anchor is drawn perpendicularly up to the cat head, by a strong tackle called the cat.—To fish the anchor; to hoist and draw up the flukes of a ship's anchor towards the top of the bow, by a machine called a fish, in order to stow it after it has been catted.—To sheer the ship to her anchor, is to steer the ship's head to the place where the anchor lies, when the seamen are heaving the cable into the ship.—To sweep the anchor, an operation which consists in dragging at the bottom of the sea for an anchor that has been lost.—To shoe the anchor, is to cover the flukes with a broad triangular piece of thick plank, whose area is greater than that of the flukes, in order to give the anchor a stronger hold in soft ground.—2. In a figurative sense, that which gives stability or security; that on which we place dependence for safety.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast; Heb. vi.

In arch., anchor is an ornament shaped somewhat like an anchor or arrowhead. It is used along with the egg ornament, and the combination is popularly called egg and dart, or egg and tongue. The ornament is applied to enrich the moulding called echinus ovolo, or quarter round, and is used in all the orders. [See ECHINUS.]

AN'CHOR, v. t. To place at anchor; as, to anchor a ship. A ship is anchored but not moored, by a single anchor.—2. To fix or fasten on; to fix in a stable condition.

AN'CHOR, v. i. To cast anchor; to come to anchor; as, our ship anchored off the isle of Wight.—2. To stop; to fix or rest on.

AN'CHORABLE, a. Fit for anchorage.

AN'CHORAGE, n. Anchor ground; a place where a ship can anchor, where the ground is not too rocky, nor the water too deep nor too shallow.—2. The hold of a ship at anchor, or rather the anchor and all the necessary tackle for anchoring.—3. A duty imposed on ships for anchoring in a harbour.

AN'CHORED, pp. Lying or riding at anchor; held by an anchor; moored; fixed in safety.

Anchored.

AN'CHORED, ANCRE'E, AN'CRED or AN'CHRY. Heraldic terms used to express a cross when its extremities are turned back like the flukes of an anchor.

AN'CHORESS, n. A female anchoret.

AN'CHORET or AN'CHORITE, n. [Gr. ἀναχωρητής, from ἀναχωρέω, to retire, of ἀνά, and χωρέω, to go. Written by some authors, anachoret.] A hermit; a recluse; one who retires from society into a desert or solitary place, to avoid the temptations of the world, and devote himself to religious duties. Also a monk, who, with the leave of the abbot, retires to a cave or cell, with an allowance from the monastery, to live in solitude.

ANCHORET'IC, ANCHORET'ICAL, a. Pertaining to a hermit; or his mode of life.

AN'CHOR-GROUND, n. Ground suitable for anchoring.

AN'CHOR-HOLD, n. The hold or fastness of an anchor; security.

AN'CHORING, ppr. Coming to anchor; casting anchor; mooring.

AN'CHOR-SMITH, n. The maker or forger of anchors, or one whose occupation is to make anchors.

ANCHO'VY, n. [Port. and Sp. anchova; G. anschove.] A small fish, about three inches in length, of the genus Clupea, found and caught in vast numbers in the Mediterranean, and pickled for exportation. It is used as a sauce or seasoning.

ANCHO'VY-PEAR, n. A fruit of Jamaica, produced by a species of the genus Grias. It is large, contains a stone, and is esculent.

ANCHU'SA, n. [Gr. αγχουσα.] A genus of plants, of the class Pentandria, and order Monogynia, and nat. order Boraginaceæ; one species is the anchusa tinctoria, or alkanet plant, used for imparting a red colour to ointments, as lip-salves, &c.

AN'CHYLOSED, a [Gr.] Immoveably united or fixed, as sometimes takes place in joints of bones, from disease.

ANCHYLO'SIS, n. [Gr. αγκυλοω, to bend.] In med., an immoveable state of a joint.

ANCHYLOT'IC, a. Pertaining to anchylosis.

ĀNCIENT, a. [Fr. ancien; It. anziano, anzi; from L. ante, antiquus.] 1. Old; that happened or existed in former times, usually at a great distance of time; as, ancient authors, ancient days. Old, says Johnson, relates to the duration of the thing itself, as an old coat; and ancient, to time in general, as an ancient dress. But this distinction is not always observed. We say, in old times, as well as ancient times; old customs, &c. We usually apply both ancient and old to things subject to gradual decay. We say an old man, an ancient record; but never the old sun, old stars, an old river or mountain. In general, however, ancient is opposed to modern, and old to new, fresh, or recent. When we speak of a thing that existed formerly, which has ceased to exist, we commonly use ancient, as ancient republics, ancient heroes, and not old republics, old heroes. But when the thing which began or existed in former times is still in existence, we use either ancient or old; as, ancient statues or paintings, or old statues or paintings; ancient authors, or old authors, meaning books. But in these examples ancient seems the most correct, or best authorized. Some persons apply ancient to men advanced in years still living; but this use is not common in modern practice.—2. Old; that has been of long duration; as, an ancient forest; an ancient city.—3. Known from ancient times; as, the ancient continent, opposed to the new continent.

ĀNCIENT, n. [Supra.] Generally used in the plural, ancients. Those who lived in former ages, opposed to moderns. In Scripture, very old men. Also, governors, rulers, political and ecclesiastical.

The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people; Isa. iii.; Jer. xix.

God is called "the Ancient of days" from his eternal existence; Dan. vii.

Hooker uses the word for seniors, "they were his ancients," but the use is not authorized.—2. Ancient is also used for a flag or streamer, in a ship of war; and for an ensign or the bearer of a flag, as in Shakspeare. Cowel supposes the word, when used for a flag, to be a corruption of end-sheet, a flag at the stern. It is probably the Fr. enseigne.

Ancient domain, or demesne, in English law, is a tenure by which all manors belonging to the crown, in the reign of William the Conqueror, were held. The numbers, names, &c. of these were all entered in a book called Domes-day Book.

ĀNCIENTLY, adv. In old times; in times long since past; as, Rome was anciently more populous than at present.

ĀNCIENTNESS, n. The state of being ancient; antiquity; existence from old times.

ĀNCIENTRY, n. Dignity of birth; the honour of ancient lineage.

ĀNCIENTY,† n. Age; antiquity.

ĀNCIENTY, n. In some old English statutes and authors, eldership or seniority.

AN'CILLARY, a. Aiding; auxiliary.

AN'CILLARY, n. [L. ancilla, a female servant.] Pertaining to a maid servant, or female service; subservient as a maid servant.

ANCIP'ITAL, a. [L. anceps.] Doubtful, or double; double-faced or double-formed; applied to the stem of a plant, it signifies a two-edged stem, compressed and forming two opposite angles.

AN'COME, n. A small ulcerous swelling coming suddenly.

AN'CON, n. [L. ancon; Gr. αγκων, the elbow.] The olecranon, the upper end of the ulna, or elbow.

AN'CONES, n. [αγκων, the point of the elbow.] In arch., the consoles or ornaments cut on the key-stones of arches, or on the side of door-cases. They are sometimes used to support busts or other figures. The corners of walls and beams are sometimes called ancones, whence the French coin and English quoin, a corner.

ANCONE'US, n. [αγκων.] A small triangular muscle, situated on the back part of the elbow. Its use is to assist in extending the fore-arm.

AN'CONY, n. [Probably from αγκων, the cubit, from its resemblance to the arm.] In iron works, a piece of half wrought iron, in the shape of a bar in the middle, but rude and unwrought at the ends. A piece of cast iron is melted off and hammered at a forge, into a mass of two feet long and square, which is called a bloom; then, carried to a finery, and worked into an ancony; it is then sent to a chafery, where the ends are wrought into the shape of the middle, and the whole is made into a bar.

ANCYLO'SED, a. A term applied to joints, of which the moveable bones are consolidated together.

ANCYLO'SIS, n. [αγκυλοω, to bend.] Stiffness and immobility of a joint. This is caused by a want of the oily fluid, secreted at the joints. Improperly written Anchylosis.

ANCYLO'TOMUS, n. [αγκυλη, a contraction, and τεμνω, to cut.] In surg., a crooked knife or bistoury; also, a knife for dividing the frænum linguæ, in tongue-tied persons.

AN'CYLUS, n. The name of the shell, usually called the fresh-water limpet.

AND, conj. [Angl. Sax. An the imperative of An-an, to give or grant; and the noun ad, a heap; thus, An-ad, An'd, And; add or grant this to that, &c.] And is a conjunction, connective or conjoining word. It signifies that a word or part of a sentence is to be added to what precedes. Thus, give me an apple and an orange; that is, give me an apple, add or give in addition to that, an orange. John and Peter and James rode to London; that is, John rode to London, add or further Peter rode to London, add James rode to London.

AN'DA, n. A Brazilian tree, the fruit of which is in an oval nut, containing two seeds. The seeds are strongly cathartic, and the green outer portion is astringent, and used in diarrhœa.

ANDALU'SITE, n. A massive mineral, of a flesh or rose-red colour; sometimes found crystallized in imperfect four-sided prisms, nearly or quite rectangular. Its hardness is nearly equal to that of corundum, and it is infusible by the blow-pipe. It has its name from Andalusia, in Spain, where it was first discovered.

ANDAN'TE, [It. from andare, to go; Eng. to wend, to wander.] In music, a word used to direct a movement moderately slow, between largo and allegro.

ANDANTI'NO. [It.] In music, the diminution of andante, used to signify a movement quicker than andante.

AN'DARAC, n. Red orpiment.

AN'DEAN, a. Pertaining to the Andes, the great chain of mountains extending through South America

ANDI'RA, n. A genus of plants of the Diadelphia Decandria class and order, and nat. order Leguminosæ. The wood is well fitted for building. One species is the Andira inermis, or cabbage tree, the bark of which is used as a medicine.

ANDI'RA-GUACU, n. In South America, the popular name of a species of bat, the Vespertilio spectrum of Linnæus, nearly as large as a pigeon.

AND'IRON, n. [Teutonic, andena or Ancient Andiron.

andela. In Sax. the corresponding word is brandisen, brand or fire iron:

D. brand-yser. The Fr. landier, Arm. lander, Junius thinks is our and-iron, with the French l prefixed.] Andirons are ancient pieces of furniture, made of iron, and used for laying wood upon to burn, in lieu of a grate. They generally consisted of an upright standard, and a horizontal bar raised above the floor. They are also called hand-irons, end-irons, and fire-dogs.

ANDORIN'HA, n. The Brazilian swallow.

ANDRANAT'OMY, n. [Gr. ανηρ, ανδρος, a man, and ανατομη, dissection.] The dissection of a human body, especially of a male.

AN'DREOLITE, n. A mineral, the harmotome, or cross-stone.

ANDROG'YNAL, } a. [Gr. ανηρ, a man,
ANDROG'YNOUS, } and γυνη, woman.] Having two sexes; being male and female; hermaphroditical. In bot., the word is applied to a plant bearing some flowers which are pistilliferous only, and others which are staminiferous only. These plants constitute the Monœcian class in Linnæus' system.

ANDROG'YNALLY, adv. With the parts of both sexes.

ANDROG'YNUS, n. A hermaphrodite.

AN'DROID, n. [Gr. ανηρ, man, and ειδος, form.] A machine in the human form, which, by certain springs, performs some of the natural motions of a living man. One of these machines, invented by M. Vaucanson, appeared at Paris in 1738, representing a flute-player.

ANDROM'EDA, n. A northern constellation, behind Pegasus, Cassiopeia, and Perseus, representing the figure of a woman chained. The stars in this constellation, in Ptolemy's catalogue, are 23; in Tycho's 22; in Bayer's, 27; in Flamstead's 84.—2. The name of a celebrated tragedy of Euripides, now lost.—3. In bot., the marsh cystus, a genus of plants, of the class Decandria and order Monogynia.

AND'RON, n. The apartments of the male members of a family, which, in ancient houses, were in the lower part.

ANDROPET'ALOUS, a. [ανηρ, a man, and πεταλον, a petal.] In bot., an epithet applied to double flowers, produced by the conversion of the stamens into petals, as in the garden ranunculus.

ANDROPH'AGI, n. [Gr. ανηρ, man, and φαγω, to eat.] Man-eaters; but the word is little used, being superseded by anthropophagi, which see. Herodotus mentions people of this character.

ANDRO'PHORUM, n. [ανηρ, man, and φερω, to bear.] In bot., a columnar expansion of the centre of the flower, on which the stamens seem to grow, as in the passion flower.

ANDROT'OMY, n. [Gr. ανηρ, a man, and τομη, a cutting.] A cutting of human bodies; dissection of the human body, as distinguished from zootomy.

ANEAR, prep. Near.

AN'ECDOTAL, a. Pertaining to anecdotes.

AN'ECDOTE, n [Gr. α priv. and εκδιδωμι, to publish, part. εκδοτος, given out.] 1. In its original sense, secret history, or facts not generally known. But in more common usage, a particular or detached incident or fact of an interesting nature; a biographical incident; a single passage of private life. Procopius gave the title of Anecdotes to a book he published against Justinian and his wife Theodora; and similar collections of incidents in the lives of eminent men are now common.—2. The relation of an incident or particular event.

ANECDOT'ICAL, a. Pertaining to anecdotes.

ANELE,† v. t. [Sax. æll, oil.] To give extreme unction.

ANEMOG'RAPHY, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and γραφη, description.] A description of the winds.

Anemometer.

ANEMOL'OGY n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and λογος, discourse.] The doctrine of winds, or a treatise on the subject.

ANEMOM'ETER, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and μετρεω, to measure.] An instrument or machine for measuring the force and velocity of the wind. There are various kinds of anemometers, but one invented by Dr. Lind is most commonly used.

ANEM'ONE, } n. [Gr.
ANEM'ONY, } ανεμωνη, from ανεμος, wind. It was by the ancient Greeks written ανεμωλια. Theoph. lib. 6, cap. 7. Plin 21, 23. Venus is said to have changed her Adonis into an anemone. Ovid. Metam. lib. 10, 735.] Wind-flower; a genus of plants of numerous species, belonging to the natural order ranunculaceæ. Some of the species are cultivated in gardens, of which their double flowers are among the most elegant ornaments. Sea Anemone. See ANIMAL-FLOWER.

ANEM'OSCOPE, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and σκοπεω, to view.] A machine which shows the course or velocity of the wind. The vane upon towers and roofs is the simplest of all anemoscopes.

ANE'MONINE, n. A crystalline substance extracted from anemone pulsatilla, nemorosa, and pratensis. By the action of baryta upon it, an acid is obtained, called anemonic acid.

AN-END. A sea term, implying the situation of any mast or boom when in a perpendicular position, with respect to the plane of the deck, tops, &c.

ANENT', prep. About; concerning; over against; a Scottish word. Qu. Gr. εναντι.

AN'EURISM, n. [Gr. ανα and ευρυνω, to dilate, from ευρυς, broad.] A preternatural dilatation or rupture of the coats of an artery. This is encysted or diffused. The encysted aneurism is when the coats of the artery being only dilated, the blood is confined to its proper coat. Of this kind is the varicose. The diffused aneurism includes all those in which, from an aperture in the artery, the blood is spread about in the cellular membrane, out of its proper course.

ANEURIS'MAL, a. Pertaining to an aneurism.

ANEW', adv. [a and new.] Over again; another time; in a new form; as, to arm anew; to create anew.

ANFRACTUOS'ITY, n. A state of being full of windings and turnings.

ANFRAC'TUOUS, a. [L. anfractus, of amb, about, and fractus, broken. See BREAK.] Winding; full of windings and turnings; written less correctly, anfractuose. In bot., applied to the lobes of an anther, when they are folded back upon themselves, and doubled and bent, till all trace of their normal character is lost. The anther of a cucumber is anfractuous.

ANFRAC'TUOUSNESS, n. A state of being full of windings and turnings.

ANFRAC'TURE, n. A mazy winding.

ANGARIA'TION,† n. [L. angario; Gr. αγγαρευω, to compel; a word of Persian origin.] Effort, exertion; forceful exertion.

ANGEIOT'OMY, n. See ANGIOTOMY.

AN'GEL, n. [L. angelus; Gr. αγγελος, a messenger, from αγγελλω, to tell or announce; from the root of call, or of Ar. kaula, to say, to tell. Sax. angel; Ir. aingeal, or aingiol.] 1. Literally, a messenger; one employed to communicate news or information, from one person to another at a distance. But appropriately,—2. A spirit, or a spiritual intelligent being employed by God to communicate his will to man. Hence angels are ministers of God, and ministering spirits; Heb. i.—3. In a bad sense, an evil spirit; as, the angel of the bottomless pit; Mat. xxv.; 1 Cor. vi.; Rev. ix.—4. Christ, the mediator and head of the church; Rev. x.—5. A minister of the gospel, who is an ambassador of God; Rev. ii. and iii.—6. Any being whom God employs to execute his judgments; Rev. xvi.—7. In the style of love, a very beautiful person.

AN'GEL, n. A fish found on the coast of Carolina, of the Thoracic order, and genus Chætodon. It has a small projecting mouth; the laminæ above the gills are armed with cerulean spines; the body, a foot in length, appears as if cut off, and waved, and covered with large green scales.

AN'GEL, n. A gold coin formerly current in England, bearing the figure of an angel. Skinner says this device was impressed upon it in allusion to an observation of Pope Gregory the Great, who, seeing some beautiful English youths in the market at Rome, asked who they were; being told they were Angli, English, he replied, they ought rather to be called angeli, angels. This coin had different values under different princes. It was formerly current in England, and its value was about ten shillings sterling.

AN'GEL, a. Resembling angels; angelic; as, angel whiteness.

AN'GEL-AGE, n. The existence or state of angels.

AN'GEL-FISH, n. A species of shark, the Squalus squatina. It is from six to Angel-fish.

eight feet long, with a large head, teeth broad at the base, but slender and sharp above, disposed in five rows, all around the jaws. The fish takes its name from its pectoral fins, which are very large, and extend horizontally, like wings when spread. This fish connects the genus of Rays with that of Sharks, partaking of the characters of both; but it differs from both in this, that its mouth is placed at the extremity of the head.

ANĠEL'IC, ANĠEL'ICAL, a. [L. angelicus.] Resembling angels; belonging to angels, or partaking of their nature; suiting the nature and dignity of angels.

ANĠEL'ICA, n. A plant, a genus of Digynian Pentanders, containing several species, belonging to the natural order Umbelliferæ. One of the species furnishes the Angelica of the gardens, used as a pot-herb.

ANĠEL'ICALLY, adv. Like an angel.

ANĠEL'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being angelic; excellence more than human.

AN'ĠELITES, in Church hist., so called from Angelicum in Alexandria, where they held their first meetings; a sect of heretics near the close of the 5th century, who held the persons of the Trinity not to be the same, nor to exist by their own nature; but each to be a God, existing by participating of a deity common to them all. They are called also Severites, from Severus their head; and Theodosians, from one Theodosius, whom they made their pope.

ANĠEL-LIKE, a. Resembling or having the manners of angels.

ANĠELOL'OĠY, n. [Angel and λογος.] A discourse on angels; or the doctrine of angelic beings.

AN'ĠELOT, n. [Fr. anche, the reed of a hautboy or other instrument of music.] 1. An instrument of music, somewhat resembling a lute.—2. An ancient English coin struck at Paris, while under the dominion of England; so called from the figure of an angel supporting the escutcheon of the arms of England and France. Also, a small rich sort of cheese made in Normandy.

ANĠEL-SHOT, n. [Fr. ange, a chain-shot.] Chain-shot, being two halves of a cannon-ball fastened to the ends of a chain.

AN'ĠEL-WATER, n. A mixture of rose, orange flower, and myrtle water, perfumed by musk and ambergris. It is made in Portugal.

ANĠEL-WELCOME, n. Welcome by angels.

ANĠEL-WINGED, a. Winged like angels.

ANĠEL-WORSHIP, n. The worshipping of angels.

AN'GER, n. [L. ango, to choke, strangle, vex; whence angor, vexation, anguish, the quinsy, angina; Gr. αγχω, to strangle, to strain, or draw together, to vex. The primary sense is to press, squeeze, make narrow. This word may be connected in origin with the Ar. hanika, to be angry, and chanaka, to strangle; Heb. Ch. Syr. Eth. חנק, chanak, to strangle. In Sax. ange signifies vexed; angmod, sad, anxious; ang-set, a carbuncle; angsum, pressed close; anxsumian, to vex, to make anxious; Eng. anguish, anxious; L. angustus, angina, &c. See ANGUISH.] 1. A violent passion of the mind, excited by a real or supposed injury; usually accompanied with a propensity to take vengeance, or to obtain satisfaction from the offending party. This passion however, varies in degrees of violence, and in ingenuous minds may be attended only with a desire to reprove or chide the offender. Anger is also excited by an injury offered to a relation, friend, or party, to whom one is attached; and some degrees of it may be excited by cruelty, injustice, or oppression offered to those with whom one has no immediate connection, or even to the community of which one is a member. Nor is it unusual to see something of this passion roused by gross absurdities in others, especially in controversy or discussion. Anger may be inflamed till it rises to rage and a temporary delirium.—2. Pain; smart of a sore or swelling: the literal sense of the word, but little used.

AN'GER, v. t. To excite anger; to provoke; to rouse resentment.—2. To make painful; to cause to smart; to inflame; as, to anger an ulcer.

AN'GERED, pp. Provoked; made angry.

AN'GERLY, adv. [anger and like.] In an angry manner; more generally written angrily.

ANĠI'NA, n. [L. from ango, to choke. See ANGER.] A quinsy; an inflammation of the throat; a tumor impeding respiration. It is a general name of the diseases called sore-throat, as quinsy, scarlet fever, croup, mumps, &c. Angina pectoris, an anomalous or spasmodic affection, generally connected with disease of the heart, or great vessels.

AN'ĠIOCAR'POUS, a. [Gr. αγγειον, a case, and καρπος, fruit.] In bot., an epithet applied to seed-vessels, which are enclosed within a covering that does not form a part of themselves, as the filbert.

ANĠIOG'RAPHY, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and γραφη, description.] A description of the vessels in the human body.

ANĠIOL'OĠY, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and λογος, discourse.] A treatise or discourse on the vessels of the human body, as the arteries, veins, lymphatics, &c.

AN ĠIOMONOSPER'MOUS, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, μονος, alone, and σπερμα, seed.] Producing one seed only in a pod.

AN'ĠIOSCOPE, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and σκοπεω, to view.] An instrument for examining the capillary vessels of a body.

AN'ĠIOSPERM, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and σπερμα, seed.] In bot., a plant which has its seeds inclosed in a pericarp.

ANĠIOSPER'MIA, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a receptacle, and σπερμα, seed.] In the artificial system of Linnæus, an order of plants of the class Didynamia. It consists of plants having numerous seeds contained in a seed vessel. It includes the Digitalis and other poisonous plants.

ANĠIOSPER'MOUS, a. Having seeds

Pod of an Angiospermous Plant.

inclosed in a pod or other pericarp, such as the pea, bean, rose, apple, &c. In Linnæus' system, the second order of plants in the Didynamian class are called Angiospermia. This word is opposed to gymnospermous, or naked-seeded.

ANĠIOSPO'ROUS, a. [αγγειον, a vessel, and σπορα, a seed.] In bot., a term applied to such fungi as have their spores inclosed in a hollow shell or bag, as Lycoperdon.

ANĠIOT'OMY, n. [Gr. αγγειον, a vessel, and τομη, a cutting.] The opening of a vessel, whether a vein or an artery, as in bleeding. It includes both arteriotomy and phlebotomy.

AN'GLE, n. [Fr. angle; L. angulus, a corner; Gr. αγκυλος; W. ongle; Sax. angel, a hook.] In pop. language, the point where two lines meet, or the meeting of two lines in a point; a corner. In geom., a plain rectilineal angle is the mutual inclination of two straight lines which meet one another, but are not in the same straight line; or a rectilineal angle is the degree of opening or divergence of two straight lines which meet one another. The point where the lines meet is called the vertex of the angle, or the angular point, and the lines which contain the angle are called its sides or legs. A clear idea of the nature of an angle is obtained, by gradually opening a carpenter's rule, or a pair of compasses; as the angle made by the parts of the rule, or the legs of the compasses, will become greater as the opening widens. It is evident that the magnitude of the angle does not depend upon the length of the lines which form it, but merely on their relative positions. An angle is best named by a single letter placed at its vertex, unless there be more angles than one at the same point. In this case the angle is generally expressed by three letters, the middle one of which is placed at the vertex, or angular point, and the other two at some other point of the lines containing it. Thus in fig. 1, the angle contained by A B and B C, may be called the angle B, or the angle at B; but in fig. 2, where there are more angles than one at the point D, the angle contained by E D and D B, is called the angle E D B. Angles are measured by an arc of a circle, described from the vertex with any radius: thus the arc D E, (fig. 1) described from B as a centre, is a measure of the angle A B C, and the angle A B C is said to be an angle of as many degrees, and parts of a degree, as there are in the arc D E, a circle being always supposed to be divided into 360 degrees [See ARC and CIRCLE.] Angles receive different names, according to their magnitude, their construction, their position, and the different branches of science in which they are employed. A right angle is an angle formed by a straight or right line falling on another perpendicularly, or an angle which is measured by an arch of 90 degrees. When a straight line, as A B, (fig. 3,) standing on another straight line C D, makes the two angles A B C and A B D equal to one another; each of these angles is called a right angle.

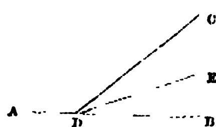

Fig. 2.

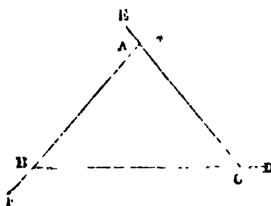
Fig. 3

An acute angle is that which is less than a right angle, as E B C. An obtuse angle is that which is greater than a right angle; as EBD. Oblique angles are either acute or obtuse, in opposition to right angles. A rectilineal angle is that which is formed by two straight lines. A curvilineal angle is formed by two curved lines. A mixed angle is formed by a straight line with a curved line. Adjacent or contiguous angles are such as have one leg, common to both angles, both together being equal to two right angles. Thus, in fig. 3, A B C and A B D, or E B C and E B D, are adjacent angles. Exterior or external angles, the angles of any rectilineal figure without it, made by producing the sides; thus, if the sides A B, B C, C A, of the triangle A B C (fig. 4) be produced to the points F,



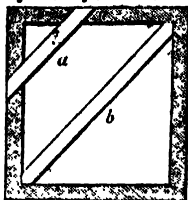


Fig. 4

D, E, the angles C B F, A C D, B A E, are called exterior angles, in opposition to the angles A B C, B C A, C A B, which are called interior angles. For exterior, interior, and alternate angles, in reference to parallel lines, see EXTERIOR, INTERIOR, and ALTERNATE. Vertical angles. [See VERTICAL.] Angles of elevation and inclination. [See ELEVATION and INCLINATION.] Angles of depression. [See DEPRESSION.] Angles of incidence, reflection, and refraction. [See INCIDENCE, REFLECTION, and REFRACTION.] Angle of position, in astr. [See POSITION.] Angle of contact, the angle which a circle or other curve makes with a tangent at the point of contact. Angle of direction, in mech., an angle contained by the lines of direction of two conspiring forces. Solid angle, that which is made by more than two plane angles meeting in one point, and not lying in the same plane, as the angle of a cube. Spherical angle, an angle on the surface of a sphere, contained between the arches of two great circles which intersect each other. Thus, if A B and B C be arches of great circles intersecting one another, at the point B, the angle A B C is the spherical angle, which they make with one another, and it is equal to the angle of inclination formed by the planes of the great circles A B and B C.—Angle bars, in carpentry, the vertical bars at the angles of a window constructed on a polygonal plan.—Angle brace, in carpentry, a piece of timber a, fixed at each extremity, to one of the two pieces forming the adjacent sides of a system of framing and subtending the angle formed by their junction. When it is fixed between the opposite angles of a quadrangular frame, it is called a diagonal brace, b. It is also called angle tie, or diagonal tie.—Angle bracket, in cornice bracketing, is the bracket which is placed in the angles and returns.—Angle bead, or staff bead, a piece of wood fixed vertically upon the exterior or salient angles of apartments to preserve them, and also to serve as a guide by which to float the plaster.—Angle capital, an Ionic capital on the flank column of a portico, having volutes on three sides, the exterior volute being placed at an angle of 135°, with the plane of the frieze on front and flank.—Angular capital, a term applied to a comparatively modern variety of the Ionic capital, having its four sides alike and all its volutes placed at an angle of 135° the plane of the frieze.—Angle rafter, also called hip rafter and piend rafter, a rafter placed in the line of meeting of the inclined planes, forming a hipped roof.

AN'GLE, n. A hook; an instrument to take fish, consisting of a rod, a line and a hook; or a line and hook.

AN'GLE, v. i. To fish with an angle, or with line and hook.—2. v. t. or i. To fish for; to try to gain by some bait or insinuation, as men angle for fish; as, to angle for the hearts of people, or to angle hearts.

AN'GLED, a. Having angles: used only in compounds.

AN'GLER, n. One that fishes with an angle.—2. A fish of the genus Lophius, Angler (Lophius piscatorius).

L. piscatorius, otherwise called the sea-devil and fishing frog. The animal couches close to the ground, and by the action of its ventral and pectoral fins, stirs up the sand or mud; hidden by the obscurity thus produced, it elevates the appendages fixed above its nose, moves them in various directions by way of attraction as a bait, and the small fishes approaching to seize them, become the prey of the Angler.

AN'GLE-ROD, n. The rod or pole to which a line and hook are fastened.

AN'GLE-SITE, n. Prismatic lead baryte.

AN'GLIC, AN'GLICAN, a [from Angles, Sax. ing, a plain or meadow, and lic, like, or Gr. ικος, like, which is the root of the L. icus, in publicus, and all similar adjectives. From ing, was formed Angles, the English, to which is added this common affix, ic. The Angles were the Ingævones of Tacitus, ing-woners, dwellers on the plain or level land, near the Elbe and Weser. See ENGLISH and WONT. Ing is annexed to many English names, as Reading, Basing, Kettering, towns situated on flat land.] English; pertaining to England or the English nation; as, the Anglican church.

AN'GLICE, [L.] In English, in the English manner.

AN'GLICISM, n An English idiom; a form of language peculiar to the English.

AN'GLICIZE, v. t. To make English; to render conformable to the English idiom, or to English analogies.

AN'GLICIZED, pp. Made English; rendered conformable to the English idiom.

ANGLIFICA'TION, n The act of converting into English.

AN'GLIFIED, pp. Made English.

AN'GLIFY, v. t. To convert into English; to anglicize; as, to anglify French words; that is, to give them an English form of orthography; to adopt words into the English language, and make them a part of it.

AN'GLIFYING, ppr. Converting into English.

AN'GLING, ppr. Fishing with an angle.

AN'GLING, n. A fishing with a rod and line.

AN'GLO-AMER'ICAN, a Pertaining to the descendants of Englishmen in America.

AN'GLO-AMER'ICAN, n. A descendant from English ancestors, born in America, or the United States.

ANGLO-DANISH, a. Pertaining to the English Danes, or the Danes who settled in England.

ANGLO-NORM'AN, a. Pertaining to the English Normans.

ANGLO-SAX'ON, a. Pertaining to the Saxons who settled in England, or English Saxons.

ANGLO-SAX'ON, n. A kind of pear; also, the language of the English Saxons.

ANGO'LA-PEA, or PIG'EON-PEA. A species of Cytisus.

AN'GOR, n. [L. See ANGER.] 1. Pain; intense bodily pain.—2. The retiring of the native bodily heat to the centre, occasioning head-ache, palpitation, and sadness.

AN'GRED, or ANG'ERED, pp. Made angry; provoked.

AN'GRILY, adv. In an angry manner; peevishly; with indications of resentment.

AN'GRY, a. [See ANGER.] 1. Feeling resentment; provoked; followed generally by with before a person.

> God is angry with the wicked every day; Ps. vii.

But it is usually followed by at before a thing.

> Wherefore should God be angry at thy voice? Eccles. v.

2. Showing anger; wearing the marks of anger; caused by anger; as, an angry countenance; angry words.—3. Inflamed, as a sore; red; manifesting inflammation.—4. Raging; furious; tumultuous.

> Or chain the angry vengeance of the waves. Judge Trumbull.

ANGSA'NA, or ANGSA'VA, n. A red gum of the East Indies, like that of dragon's blood.

AN'GU, n. Bread made of the Cassada, a plant of the West Indies.

AN'GUIFER, n. [L. anguis, a serpent, and fero, to bear; Sans. agui.] In astr., a cluster of stars in the form of a man holding a serpent; Serpentarius, one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

ANGUIL'LA, n. [L. an eel.] In zool., an eel; also the name of a Mediterranean fish used for food, called also Hospetus and Atherina. Qu. Atherina hepsetus, Linn.

ANGUIL'LIFORM, a. [L. anguilla, an eel, and forma, shape.] In the form of an eel, or of a serpent; resembling an eel or serpent.

AN'GUISH, n. [Fr. angoisse; It. angoscia; Sp. angustia; Port. angustia, showing the direct derivation of this word from L. angustia, narrowness, from pressure: D. and G. angst; Dan. angest. This and a numerous class of words, are from the root ang, eng, denoting narrow from pressure. See ANGER.] Extreme pain, either of body or mind. As bodily pain, it may differ from agony, which is such distress of the whole body as to cause contortion, whereas anguish may be a local pain, as of an ulcer, or gout. But anguish and agony are nearly synonymous. As pain of the mind, it signifies any keen distress from sorrow, remorse, despair, and the kindred passions.

And they hearkened not to Moses, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage. Ex. vi.

AN'GUISH, v. t. To distress with extreme pain or grief.

AN'GUISHED, pp. Extremely pained, tortured; deeply distressed.

ANGU'IUM LAPIS, n. The name of a supposed stone in Germany, which is cylindric, with a cavity capable of admitting the finger, of a yellow colour, with variegations.

AN'GULAR, a. Having an angle, angles, or corners; pointed; as, an angular figure.—2. Consisting of an angle; forming an angle; as, an angular point. Angular motion, in mechanics, is the motion of any body which moves circularly about a point; as the angular motion of a pendulum. In astr., the increasing angle made by two lines drawn from a central body, as the sun or earth, to the apparent places of two planets in motion. In bot., an epithet used to designate stems, leaves, petioles, &c., which are of an angular shape. Angular processes, in anat., are the arbitrary processes of the frontal bone. Angular section, the division of an angle into any number of equal parts. In modern math., the term angular sections is used to denote that branch of analysis which is employed in the investigation of the properties of circular functions.

ANGULAR'ITY, n. The quality of having an angle or corner.

AN'GULARNESS, n. The quality of being angular.

AN'GULARLY, adv. With angles, or corners; in the direction of the angles.

AN'GULATED, a. Formed with angles or corners.

ANGULOS'ITY, n. A state of being angular.

AN'GULOUS, a. Angular; having corners; hooked.

ANGUST',† a. [L. angustus.] Narrow; strait.

ANGUS'TATE, a. [L. angustatus.] Beginning with a narrow base, which base then dilates and thickens. A term in nat. hist.

ANGUSTA'TION, n. [L. angustus, narrow. See ANGER.] The act of making narrow; a straitening, or being made narrow.

ANGUST'ICLAVE, n. [L. angustus, narrow, and clavus, a knob or stud.] A robe or tunic embroidered with purple studs or knobs, or by purple stripes, worn by Roman knights. The laticlave, with broader studs, was worn by senators.

ANGUS'TIDENS, a. [L. angustus and dens, a tooth.] Narrow toothed; a species of Mastodon.

ANGUSTIFOL'IOUS, a. [Lat.] A botanical term signifying narrow-leaved.

ANHELA'TION, [L. anhelo, to pant, or breathe with difficulty; from halo, to breathe.] Shortness of breath; a panting; difficult respiration without fever, or with a sense of suffocation.

ANHELOSE, a. Out of breath; panting; breathing with difficulty. [Little used.]

ANHIMA, n. A Brazilian aquatic fowl, larger than a swan, somewhat like a crane. Its head is small, its bill black, the toes armed with long claws. But what is remarkable, is a horn growing from its forehead; and the second joint of the wing is armed with two straight triangular spurs, an inch in length. The fidelity between the male and female is so great, that when one dies, the other remains by the carcase till it expires.

AN'HYDRITE, n. [See ANHYDROUS.] A species of sulphate of lime, anhydrous gypsum, of which there are several varieties; compact, granular, fibrous, radiated, sparry, siliciferous or vulpinite, and convoluted.

ANHY'DROUS, a. [Gr. ἄνυδρος, dry; a priv. and ὕδωρ, water.] Destitute of water. Anhydrite is so called, because it is destitute of the water of crystallization.

ANIENT'ED,† a. [It. niente, nothing; Norm. neant; Fr. aneantir; to annihilate.] Frustrated; brought to naught.

ANIGHT', adv. [a or at, and night.] In the night time. Anights, in the plural, is used of frequent and customary acts.

You must come in earlier anights. Shak.

AN'IL, n. [Sp. anil, indigo; Ar. nilon, slender, nila, blue.] A shrub from whose leaves and stalks indigo is made; Indigofera, or the Indigo plant.

AN'ILE, a. [L. anilis.] Aged, imbecile. Old womanish.

ANIL'IC ACID, n. Indigotic acid. It is formed when indigo is gradually added to boiling nitric acid previously distilled with 12 or 15 parts of water. It forms soluble and crystallizable salts with ammonia, and with the oxides of lead and silver.

AN'ILINE, n. An organic base, a product of the action of heat on anthranilic acid. It is a colourless oily liquid having a strong unpleasant aromatic smell. It forms salts with acids.

ANIL'ITY, n. [L. anilis, anilitas, from anus, an old woman; Celtic, hen, old.] The state of being an old woman; the old age of a woman; dotage.

AN'IMABLE, a. Susceptible of animation.

ANIMADVERS'AL, a. That which has the power of perceiving.

ANIMADVER'SION, n. [L. animadversio.] Remarks by way of censure or criticism; reproof; blame. It may sometimes be used for punishment, or punishment may be implied in the word, but this is not common. In an ecclesiastical sense, it differs from censure, says Ayliffe; censure, respecting spiritual punishment, and animadversion, a temporal one. Glanville uses the word in the sense of perception, but this use is not authorized.

ANIMADVER'SIVE, a. That has the power of perceiving.

ANIMADVERS'IVENESS, n. The power of animadverting.

ANIMADVERT', v. i. [L. animadverto, of animus, mind, and adverto, to turn to.] 1. To turn the mind to; to consider.—2. To consider or remark upon by way of criticism or censure.—3. To inflict punishment; followed by upon.

ANIMADVERT'ER, n. One who animadverts or makes remarks by way of censure.

ANIMADVERT'ING, ppr. Considering; remarking by way of criticism or censure.

AN'IMAL, n. [L. animal, from anima, air, breath, soul; Gaelic anam, breath. The W. has enwil, en, a being, soul, spirit, and mil, a beast; Arm. aneval; San. an, animi.] An organized body, endowed with life and the power of voluntary motion; a living, sensitive, locomotive body; as man is an intelligent animal. Animals are essentially distinguished from plants by the property of sensation. The contractile property of some plants, as the Mimosa, has the appearance of the effect of sensation, but it may be merely the effect of irritability. The distinction here made between animals and vegetables, may not be philosophically accurate; for we cannot perhaps ascertain the precise limit between the two kinds of beings, but this is sufficiently correct for common practical purposes. The history of animals is called zoology. By way of contempt, a dull person is called a stupid animal.

AN'IMAL, a. That belongs or relates to animals; as, animal functions.—Animal is distinguished from intellectual; as, animal appetites, the appetites of the body, as hunger and thirst.—The animal functions, are touch, taste, motions, &c.—Animal life is opposed to vegetable life.—Animal is opposed also to spiritual or rational, which respects the sou and reasoning faculties; as, animal nature, spiritual nature, rational nature.—Animal food may signify that food which nourishes animals; but it usually denotes food consisting of animal flesh.—Animal economy is the system of laws by which the bodies of animals are governed, and depending on their organic structure.—Animal spirit is a name given to the nervous fluid.—Animal spirits in the plural, life, vigour, energy.—Animal heat, that property of all animals by means of which they preserve a certain temperature which is quite independent of that of the medium by which they are surrounded. The human species preserves a temperature nearly equal, being from 96° to 100° Fahr., in all regions of the globe, and even when exposed to the most extreme degrees of temperature.—Animal magnetism, a pretended agent of a peculiar nature, supposed to be capable in some mysterious mode of producing the most powerful effects on the human frame,

This fanciful science appears to have originated with Mesmer and other German illuminés, who believed that the power of a common magnet might be made to act on the human frame, and that this power once imparted to a professor, might afterwards be communicated to others without the agency of ferruginous bodies.—Animal kingdom, one of the three principal divisions into which all organized bodies are divided by Linnæus. It comprehends six classes of animals, namely, Mammalia, Aves, Amphibia, Pisces, Insectæ, Vermes. The study of the objects comprehended within this kingdom of nature is termed zoology. [See ZOOLOGY.]

ANIMALCULA, [from the Lat.] is more frequently used as the plural of animalcule, than animalcules. Animalculæ is a barbarism.

ANIMAL'CULAR, } a. Relating to ANIMAL'CULINE, } animalcula.

ANIMAL'CULE, n. [L. animalculum, animalcula] A little animal; but appropriately, an animal whose figure cannot be discerned without the aid of a magnifying glass; such as are invisible to the naked eye.

ANIMAL'CULIST, n. One versed in the knowledge of animalcules.

AN'IMAL-FLOWER, n. In zool, sea-anemone, the name of several species of animals belonging to the genus Actinia. They are called sea-anemone from the resemblance of their claws or tentacles to the petals of some flowers. These are disposed in regular circles, and tinged with various bright colours. Some of these animals are hemispherical, others cylindrical; others are shaped like a fig. Some are stiff and gelatinous; others, fleshy and muscular; but all can alter their figure by extending their claws in search of food. These animals can move slowly, but are generally fixed by one end to rocks or stones in the sand. On the other extremity is the mouth in the centre, which is surrounded by rows of fleshy claws, and capable of great dilatation They are very voracious, and will swallow a muscle, or crab, as large as a hen's egg.—The term Animal-flower is also extended to many other marine animals, from their resemblance to flowers. They belong to the Holothurias, which, with the Actinias, were ranged under the Molluscs by Linnæus; and to the Tubularias and Hydras, which were classed with the Zoophytes. They are all arranged under the Zoophytes by Cuvier.

AN'IMALISH, a. Like an animal.

AN'IMALISM, n. The state of mere animals, actuated by sensual appetites only, without intellectual or moral qualities.

ANIMAL'ITY, n. Animal existence.

ANIMALIZA'TION, n. The act of giving animal life, or endowing with the properties of an animal.

AN'IMALIZE, v t. To give animal life to; to endow with the properties of animals.—2. To convert into animal matter.

AN'IMALIZED, pp. Endowed with animal life.

AN'IMALIZING, ppr. Giving animal life to.

AN'IMALNESS, n. The state of animal existence.

AN'IMATE, v. t. [L. animo. See ANIMAL.] 1. To give natural life to; to quicken; to make alive; as, the soul animates the body.—2. To give powers to, or to heighten the powers or effect of a thing; as, to animate a lyre.—3. To give spirit or vigour; to infuse courage, joy, or other enlivening passion; to stimulate or incite; as, to animate dispirited troops.

AN'IMATE, a. Alive; possessing animal life. [This word is used chiefly in poetry for animated.]

AN'IMATED, pp. Being endowed with animal life; as the various classes of animated beings.—2. a. Lively; vigorous; full of spirit; indicating animation; as, an animated discourse.

AN'IMATING, ppr. Giving life; infusing spirit; enlivening

AN'IMATINGLY, adv. So as to animate or excite feeling.

ANIMA'TION, n. The act of infusing life; the state of being animated.—2. The state of being lively, brisk, or full of spirit and vigour; as, he recited the story with great animation.

AN'IMATIVE, a. That has the power of giving life or spirit.

AN'IMATOR, n. One that gives life; that which infuses life or spirit.

AN'IME, n [Fr] In her, a term denoting that the eyes of a rapacious animal are borne of a different tincture from the animal himself.

AN'IME, n. [Sp.] A resin exuding from the stem of a large American tree, (Hymenæa,) called by the natives courbaril; by Piso, jutaiba. It is of a transparent amber colour, a light agreeable smell, and of little or no taste. It dissolves entirely, but not readily, in rectified spirit of wine, and is used by the Brazilians in fumigations, for pains proceeding from cold.

ANIMET'TA, n. Among eccles. writers, the cloth which covers the cup of the eucharist

AN'IMIST, n. One who maintains that the soul is the only cause of life. One who maintains that the functions of plants and animals are dependent upon vitality, instead of mere mechanical and chemical powers

Animo furandi. [L.] In law, intent to steal.

ANIMOS'ITY, n [L. animositas; Fr animosité; from L. animosus, animated, courageous, enraged; from animus, spirit, mind, passion. So in Teutonic, mod, mind, signifies also pride, passion, anger. Animus, spirit, Gr. ανεμος, wind, breath, is from flowing, swelling, rushing, which gives the sense of violent action and passion. See ANIMAL.] Violent hatred, accompanied with active opposition; active enmity. Animosity differs from enmity, which may be secret and inactive; and it expresses a less criminal passion than malice Animosity seeks to gain a cause or destroy an enemy or rival, from hatred or private interest; malice seeks revenge for the sake of giving pain.

ANIN'GA, n. A root growing in the West Indies, like the China plant, used in refining sugar.

AN'ISE, n. (an'nis.) [L. anisum; Gr. ανισον; Ar. ainison. Cast. 1619.] An annual plant, placed by Linnæus under the genus Pimpinella. It grows naturally in Egypt, and is cultivated in Spain and Malta, whence the seed, or rather the fruit, is imported. The stalk rises a foot and a half high, dividing into slender branches, garnished with narrow leaves, cut into three or four narrow segments. The branches terminate in large loose umbels, composed of smaller umbels or rays, on long footstalks. The flowers are small, and of a yellowish white; the seeds oblong and swelling. Anise seeds have an aromatic smell, and a pleasant warm taste; they are useful in warming the stomach and expelling wind.

AN'ISE-SEED, n. The seed, or more properly the fruit of anise.

ANISODAC'TYLES, n. [Gr. ανισος, unequal, and δακτυλος, a digit.] The name given by Temminck to an order of birds, including those insessorial species the toes of which are of unequal length, as in the nuthatch.

ANISODYN'AMOUS, a. [Gr. ανισος, unequal, and δυναμις, power.] A name given to monocotyledonous plants, because having only one cotyledon, they grow at first with more force on one side of their axis than on the other.

ANISOSTEM'ONOUS, a. [Gr. ανισος, unequal, and στημων, a stamen.] A term used in bot., when the number of stamens in a flower neither corresponds with the calyx nor corolla, in number or power, as, for instance, when a flower having five sepals has three or seven stamens.

ANISO'STOMOUS, a. [Gr. ανισος, unequal, and στομα, a mouth.] In bot., a term sometimes applied to the divisions of a calyx or corolla, which are unequal; but the term unequal or irregular is usually employed.

ANK'ER, n. [Dutch.] A measure of liquids used in Holland, containing about 32 gallons, English measure. Chambers says it contains two stekans; each stekan 16 mengles; each mengle two wine quarts.—2. An English measure of wine or spirits, equal to 10 of the old gallons, or 8⅓ imperial gallons =2310.6 cubic inches.

AN'KERITE, n. Paratomous lime-haloid.

ANK'LE, n. (ank'l.) [Sax. ancleow; D. enkel.] The joint which connects the foot with the leg

ANK'LE-BONE, n. The bone of the ankle.

AN'KLET, n. A little ankle; an ornament for the ankle.

AN'NALIST, n. [See ANNALS.] A writer of annals.

AN'NALIZE, v t. To record; to write annals. [Not much used.]

AN'NALS, n. plur. [L. annales, annalis, from annus, a year, the root of which may be the Celtic an, ain, a great circle Varro says the word annus signifies a great circle.] 1. A species of history digested in order of time, or a relation of events in chronological order, each event being recorded under the year in which it happened. Annals differ from history, in merely relating events, without observations on the motives, causes, and consequences, which, in history, are more diffusively illustrated.—2. The books containing annals; as the Annals of Tacitus.

ANNATS, n. [L. annus] A year's income of a spiritual living; the first fruits, originally given to the Pope, upon the decease of a bishop, abbot, or parish clerk, and paid by his successor. In England, they were, at the Reformation, vested in the king, and in the reign of Queen Anne restored to the church, and appropriated to the augmentation of poor livings. In Scotland, An or Annat, is the half-year's stipend, payable for the vacant half-year after the death of a clergyman, and to which his family, or nearest of kin have right, under the act 1672 c. 13

ANNEAL, v. t. [Sax. anælan, on-ælan, to kindle or inflame, to heat; from ælan, to kindle, to heat, or bake, and to anoint with oil. Sax. æl, oil. Hence it may be inferred, that oil is named from inflaming, or burning.] 1. To heat; to heat, as glass and iron vessels, for the purpose of rendering them less brittle, or to fix colours; vulgarly called nealing. This is done by heating the metal nearly to fluidity, in an oven or furnace, and suffering it to cool gradually. Metals made hard and brittle by hammering, by this process recover their malleability. The word is applied also to the baking of tiles.—2. To temper by heat; and Shenstone uses it for tempering by cold.

ANNEALED, pp. Heated; tempered; made malleable and less brittle by heat.

ANNEALING, ppr. Heating; tempering by heat.

ANNECT'ANT, a. Connecting; annexing.

AN'NELIDS, ANNEL'IDANS, or ANNEL'IDÆ, n. [L. annellus, a little ring; and Gr. εἶδος, form.] An extensive division, or class of animals, established by modern naturalists, partly at the expense of Linnæus's class of worms. The name is derived from annulus, a ring, because this division of animals have their bodies formed of a great number of smaller rings, as in the earth worm. The hair-worm and leech belong to this division.

ANNEX', n Something annexed.

ANNEX', v. t. [L. annecto, annexum; Fr. annexer; of ad and necto, to tie, or connect.] 1. To unite at the end; as, to annex a codicil to a will. To subjoin; to affix.—2. To unite, as a smaller thing to a greater; as, to annex a province to a kingdom.—3. To unite to something preceding, as the main object; to connect with; as, to annex a penalty to a prohibition, or punishment to guilt.

ANNEX', v. i. To join; to be united.

ANNEXA'TION, n. The act of annexing, or uniting at the end; conjunction; addition; the act of connecting; union. In English law, the uniting of lands or rents to the crown. In Scots law, it signifies the appropriating of church lands to the crown, and the union of lands lying at a distance from the kirk to which they belong, to the kirk to which they are more contiguous.

ANNEX'ED, pp. Joined at the end; connected with; affixed.

ANNEX'ING, ppr. Uniting at the end; affixing.

ANNEX'ION, n. The act of annexing; annexation; addition. [Little used.]

ANNEX'MENT, n. The act of annexing; the thing annexed.

ANNI'HILABLE, a. That may be annihilated.

ANNI'HILATE, v. t. [L. ad and nihilum, a trifle.] 1. To reduce to nothing; to destroy the existence of; as, no human power can annihilate matter.—2. To destroy the form or peculiar distinctive properties, so that the specific thing no longer exists; as, to annihilate a forest by cutting and carrying away the trees, though the timber may still exist; to annihilate a house by demolishing the structure.

AN'NUAL, a. [Fr. annuel; L. annalis, from annus, a year; Gr. ἔνος, ἐνιαυτός.] 1. Yearly; that returns every year; coming yearly; as, an annual feast.—2. Lasting or continuing only one year or season; that requires to be renewed every year. Leaves that grow in the spring, and perish in the autumn, are called annual, in opposition to evergreen. By this name, gardeners designate all plants, which, if sown in the spring, will flower, perfect their seed, and perish in the course of the same season; if two seasons are requisite for this purpose, the plants are then called biennials; but annuals, if sown in the autumn, become biennials.—3. Performed in a year; as, the annual motion of the earth.

Annual rent, in Scotch law, is a yearly profit due to a creditor by way of interest, for a given sum of money. Right of annual rent, in Scotch law, was a deed by which, in consideration of a certain price paid to him, a proprietor of lands granted a yearly rent out of his property, redeemable by him, on repayment of the purchase money.

AN'NUAL, n. A plant that lives but one year, or rather but one summer.—2. A name applied to books published annually, but frequently limited to illustrated works issued towards Christmas.

AN'NUALLY, adv. Yearly; returning every year; year by year.

ANNU'ITANT, n. [See ANNUITY.] One who receives, or is entitled to receive an annuity.

ANNU'ITY, n. [Fr. annuité, from annus, a year. [See ANNUAL.] A periodical payment of money, amounting to a fixed sum in each year, and continuing for a certain period, as 10, 20, or 100 years; or for an uncertain period, to be determined by a particular event, as on the failure of a life, in which case it is called a life annuity; or for an indefinite term, and then it is called a perpetual annuity. The times of payment may be either yearly, half-yearly, quarterly, or any other intervals that may be determined upon by the parties. An annuity commencing at present, is one, the first payment of which becomes due one year, one half-year, or one quarter, hence, according to the agreement. An annuity in arrears, is one that has been forborne or left unpaid for a certain number of years. A deferred or reversionary annuity, is one that does not commence till after a certain period or number of years, or till the decease of a person, or some other future event has happened. An annuity in possession, is one which has already commenced. Annuity of tiends or tithes, in Scotch law, was an allowance to the king by the commission of tiends of 6 per cent. from the teind of erected benefices; but this right has lain dormant since 1674. All calculations relating to annuities are made on the principle of improving money at compound interest. The value of life annuities is calculated according to the probable duration of the lives by which they are limited. Governments often borrow money upon annuities, that is, for a certain sum advanced on loan, the government contracts to pay the lender a specific sum for life, or for a term of years. The stock created by such loans is transferable.

ANNUL', v. t. [Fr. annuller, of L. ad nullum, to nothing.] 1. AN'T, In old authors, is a contraction of an it, that is, if it. [See AN.]

ĂNT, in our vulgar dialect, as in the phrases I ănt, you ănt, he ănt, we ănt, &c., is undoubtedly a contraction of the Danish, er, ere, the substantive verb, in the present tense of the indicative mode, and not, I er-not, we ere-not, he er-not, or of the Swedish ar, the same verb, infinitive vara, to be. These phrases are doubtless legitimate remains of the Gothic dialect.

ĂNT, n. [Sax. æmet, emmet, contracted nto ant; Ger. ameise.] An emmet; a pismire; a hymenopterous insect of the genus Formica, Linn. Ants live in communities, and the internal economy of their habitation, or hillock, presents an extraordinary example of the results of combined industry. Each community consists of males with four wings; of females much larger than the males, and possessing wings only during the pairing season; and of barren females, otherwise called neuters, workers, or nurses, destitute of wings. The young grubs are fed by the females and by the nurses, who are also the formers of the streets and galleries, &c., of the colony, and the performers generally of the work of the community. The males, like the drone bees, are useless to the community after the pairing season. There are many species of ants, from the operations they perform, called mining ants, carpenters, masons, &c. The favourite food of ants is honey, particularly honey-dew; but some species are carnivorous, and will eat insects, fruit, and almost anything eaten by other animals. The popular belief, that ants store up corn for the winter, is erroneous. The name, ant, is also given to insects of the genus Termes. [See TERMITES.]

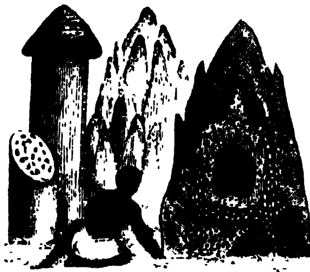
ĂNT-BEAR or ĂNT-EATER, n. A quadruped that feeds upon ants. This animal has no teeth, but a snout or muzzle, with a long cylindrical tongue.

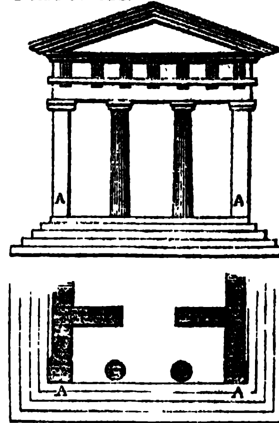


Great Ant-Eater (Myrmecophaga Jubata.)

The body is covered with long hair. There are several species, constituting the genus Myrmecophaga, ant-eaters.

ĂNT-EGGS, n. Little white balls found in the hillocks of ants, usually supposed to be their eggs, but found on examination to be the young brood in their first state. They are vermicules, wrapped in a film, composed of a silky substance, spun like a spider's web.

ĂNT-HILL, n. A little tumulus or hillock, formed by ants, for their habitation. In tropical climates, the nest of some species of the white ant, (Termites,) are sometimes elevated to a great height above the surface of the ground, like pyramids or towers, occasionally surmounted by a solid roof, which, by their height and number, appear at a distance like a small village.



Termites Ant-hills.

ANTAC'ID, n. [anti and acid.] In pharmacy, an alkali, or a remedy for sourness or acidity. Dyspepsia and diarrhœa are the diseases in which antacids are chiefly employed. The principal antacids in use are potash, soda, ammonia, magnesia, lime, and their carbonates.

ANTAC'RID, n. [anti and acrid.] That which corrects acrimony.

ANTÆ, n. plural, no singular. [Probably from αντια or αντιος, opposite to.] The pier-formed ends of the pteromata, or side walls of temples, when they are prolonged beyond the face of the walls. A term applied to pilasters when they stand opposite to a column. A portico in Antis, is when columns stand between antæ. For the other arrangement of antæ, see cut under AMPHIPROSTYLE.

Portico in Antis; A, A, Antæ.

ANTAG'ONISM, n. Opposition of action; counteraction of things or principles. The action of muscles which oppose each other.

ANTAG'ONIST, n. [Gr. αντι, against, and αγωνιστης, a champion. See ACT and AGONY.] 1. One who contends with another in combat; used primarily in the Grecian games; an adversary.—2. An opponent in controversy.—3. In anat., a muscle which acts in opposition to another; as a flexor, which bends a part, is the antagonist of an extensor, which extends it.

ANTIMO'NOUS AC'ID, n. An acid consisting of two equivalents of antimony and four of oxygen.

AN'TIMONY, n. [Fr. antimoine; Low L. antimonium; It. antimonio; Sp. id. This by some writers is supposed to be composed of anti and Fr. moine, monk, from the fact that certain monks were poisoned by it. This story, reported by Furetiere, is treated by Morin as fabulous, and by him it is said to be composed of Gr. αντι, against, and μονος, alone, and so named because it is not found alone. The real truth is not ascertained.] Primarily, a metallic ore consisting of sulphur combined with a metal; the sulphuret of antimony, the stibium of the Romans, and the στιμμι of the Greeks. It is a blackish mineral, which stains the hands, hard, brittle, full of long, shining, needle-like striæ. It is found in the mines of Bohemia and Hungary; in France and England, and in America. This word is also used for the pure metal or regulus of antimony, a metal of a grayish or silvery white, very brittle, and of a plated or scaly texture, and of moderate specific gravity. By exposure to air, its surface becomes tarnished, but does not rust. It is used as an ingredient in concave mirrors, giving them a finer texture. In bells, it renders the sound more clear; it renders tin more hard, white and sonorous, and gives to printing types more firmness and smoothness. It is also useful in promoting the fusion of metals, and especially in casting cannon balls. In its crude state, it is harmless to the human constitution; but many of its preparations act violently as emetics and cathartics. It is justly regarded as a most valuable remedy in many diseases.

ANTIMOR'ALIST, n. An opposer of morality.

ANTIMU'SICAL, a. Opposed to music; having no ear for music.

ANTINEPHRIT'IC, a. [anti and nephritic, which see.] Counteracting diseases of the kidneys.

Antiparallels.

the angle B equal to the angle E, and the angle C equal to the angle D; then BC and DE are antiparallels with respect to AB and AC; also these latter are antiparallels, with respect to the two former.

ANTIPARALYT'IC, a. [αντι, and paralytic, which see.] Good against the palsy.

ANTIPARALYT'IC, n. A remedy for the palsy.

ANTIPATHET'IC, ANTIPATHET'ICAL, a. [See ANTIPATHY.] Having a natural contrariety, or constitutional aversion to a thing.

ANTIPATHET'ICALNESS, n. The quality or state of having an aversion or contrariety to a thing.

ANTIPATH'IC, a. [Gr. αντι, and παθος, feeling.] Having opposite affections. In med., the same as allopathy.

ANTIP'ATHY n. [Gr. αντι, against, and παθος, feeling.] Natural aversion; instinctive contrariety or opposition in feeling; an aversion felt at the presence, real or ideal, of a particular object. This word literally denotes a natural aversion, which may be of different degrees, and in some cases may excite terror or horror at the presence of an object. Such is the aversion of animals for their natural enemies, as the antipathy of a mouse to a cat, or a weasel. Sometimes persons have an insuperable constitutional antipathy to certain kinds of food. The word is applied also to aversion contracted by experience or habit; as when a person has suffered an injury from some food, or from an animal, which before was not an object of hatred; or when a particular kind of food or medicine is taken into a sickly stomach, and which nauseates it: the effect is antipathy, which is often of long continuance. Antipathy however, is often affected; as when persons pretend a great aversion to things from false delicacy.—2. In ethics, antipathy is hatred, aversion or repugnancy; hatred to persons; aversion to persons or things; repugnancy to actions. Of these, hatred is most voluntary. Aversion, and antipathy, in its true sense, depend more on the constitution; repugnancy may depend on reason or education.

Inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments to others, are to be avoided. Washington.

3. In physics, a contrariety in the properties or affections of matter, as of oil and water, which will not mix. Antipathy is regularly followed by to, sometimes by against; and is opposed to sympathy.

ANTIPATRIOT'IC, a. Not patriotic; opposing the interests of one's country.

ANTIPE'DES or ANTEPE'DES, n. [L. anti, before, and pes foot.] In zool., the anterior or pectoral extremities.

ANTIPHLOGIS'TIC, n. Any medicine or diet which tends to obviate a phlogistic condition.

AN'TIPHON, n. [See ANTIPHONY.] The chant or alternate singing in choirs of cathedrals.

ANTIPH'ONAL, ANTIPHON'IC, ANTIPHON'ICAL, a. [See ANTIPHONY.] Pertaining to antiphony or alternate singing.

ANTIPH'ONARY, n. [Gr. αντι, contrary, and φωνη, sound, voice.] A service book, in the Catholic church, containing all the invitatories, responsories, collects, and whatever is said or sung in the choir, except the lessons; called also a responsary; compiled by Gregory the Great.

ANTIPH'ONER, n. A book of anthems or antiphons.

ANTIPH'ONY, n. [Gr. αντι, contrary, and φωνη, voice.] 1 The answer of one choir to another, when an anthem or psalm is sung by two choirs; alternate singing.—2. A species of psalmody, when a congregation is divided into two parts, and each sings the verses alternately.—3. The words given out at the beginning of a psalm, to which both the choirs are to accommodate their singing.—4. A musical composition of several verses, extracted from different psalms.

ANTIPH'RASIS, n. [Gr. αντι, against, and φρασις, a form of speech.] The use of words in a sense opposite to their proper meaning; as when a court of justice is called a court of vengeance.

ANTIPHRAS'TIC, ANTIPHRAS'TICAL, a. Pertaining to antiphrasis.

ANTIPHRAS'TICALLY, adv. In the manner of antiphrasis.

ANT'IPHTHISIC, a. [Gr. αντι, and φθισις, a wasting.] Applied to remedies against consumption.

AN'TIQUARY, n. [L. antiquarius.] A person who studies the history of ancient things, as statues, coins, medals, paintings, inscriptions, books and manuscripts, or searches for them, and explains their origin and purport; one versed in antiquity. In England, and particularly in Scotland, there are important associations of antiquaries.

AN'TIQUATE, v. t. [L. antiquo. See ANTIQUARY.] To make old, or obsolete; to make old in such a degree as to put out of use. Hence, when applied to laws or customs, it amounts to make void or abrogate.

Christianity might reasonably introduce new laws and antiquate or abrogate old ones. Hale.

AN'TIQUATED, pp. Grown old; obsolete; out of use; having lost its binding force by non-observance; as, an antiquated law.

AN'TIQUATEDNESS, n. The state of being old or obsolete.

AN'TIQUATENESS, n. A state of being obsolete.

ANTIQUA'TION, n. The state of being antiquated.

ANTIQUE, a. (anteek) [Fr. from L. antiquus, probably from ante.] 1. Old; ancient; of genuine antiquity; in this sense it usually refers to the flourishing ages of Greece and Rome; as an antique statue.—2. Old, as respects the present age, or a modern period of time; of old fashion, as an antique robe.—3. Odd; wild; fanciful; more generally written antic.

ANTIQUE, n. (anteek.) In general, any thing very old; but in a more limited sense, the remains of ancient artists, as busts, statues, paintings, and vases, the works of Grecian and Roman antiquity.

ANTIQUE'LY, adv. In an antique manner.

ANTIQUENESS, n. (anteekness.) The quality of being ancient; an appearance of ancient origin and workmanship.

ANTIQ'UITY, n. [L. antiquitas.] 1. Ancient times; former ages; times long since past; a very indefinite term; as, Cicero was the most eloquent orator of antiquity.—2. The ancients; the people of ancient times; as, the fact is admitted by all antiquity.

Meaning that mankind are inclined to verify the predictions of antiquity. Dawes.

3. Ancientness; great age; the quality of being ancient; as, a statue of remarkable antiquity; a family of great antiquity.—4. Old age; a ludicrous sense used by Shakspeare.—5. The remains of ancient times. In this sense it is usually or always plural. Antiquities comprehend all the remains of ancient times; all the monuments, coins, inscriptions, edifices, history, and fragments of literature, offices, habiliments, weapons, manners, ceremonies, laws, religion; in short, whatever respects any of the ancient nations of the earth.

ANTIREVOLU'TIONARY, a. [See REVOLUTION.] Opposed to a revolution; opposed to an entire change in the form of government.

ANTIREVOLU'TIONIST, n. One who is opposed to a revolution in government.

ANTISABBATA'RIAN, n. [anti and sabbath.] One of a sect who oppose the observance of the Christian sabbath; maintaining that the Jewish sabbath was only of ceremonial, not of moral obligation, and was consequently abolished by Christ.

ANTISA'BIAN, a. [See SABIAN.] Opposed or contrary to Sabianism or the worship of the celestial orbs.

ANTISACERDO'TAL, a. Adverse to priests.

ANTIS'CIAN, ANTIS'CIANS n. [L. antiscii, of Gr. αντι, opposite, and σκια, shadow.] In geog., the inhabitants of the earth, living on different sides of the equator, whose shadows at noon are cast in contrary directions. Those who live north of the equator are antiscians to those on the south, and vice versa; the shadows on one side being cast toward the north; those on the other, toward the south.

ANTITRINITA'RIAN, a. Opposing the trinity.

ANTITRINITA'RIANISM, n. A denial of the trinity.

ANTITROP'AL or ANTITRO'POUS,

a. [Gr. αντι, opposite, and τρεπω, to turn.] A term used in bot., when in a seed the radicle of the embryo is turned to the end farthest away from the hilum.

ANTIT'ROPAL, a. Opposing tropes.

AN'TITYPE, n. [Gr. αντιτυπον, of αντι, against, and τυπος, a type, or pattern.] A figure corresponding to another figure; that of which the type is the pattern or representation. Thus the paschal lamb, in Scripture, is the type, of which Christ is the antitype. An antitype, then, is something which is formed according to a model, or pattern, and bearing strong features of resemblance to it. In the Greek liturgy, the sacramental bread and wine are called antitypes, that is, figures, similitudes; and the Greek fathers used the word in a like sense.

ANTITYP'ICAL, a. Pertaining to an antitype; explaining the type.

ANTITYP'ICALLY, adv. By way of antitype.

ANTIVARI'OLOUS, a. [anti and variolous, which see.] Opposing the small pox.

ANTIVENE'REAL, a. [anti and venereal, which see.] Resisting venereal poison. Applied to medicines supposed to have the effect of extinguishing the venereal appetite, and also to such as are used in the cure of the venereal disease.

ANT'LER, n. [From the root of ante, before; Fr. andouiller. See ANTE.] A start or branch of a horn, especially of the horns of the cervine animals, as of the stag or moose. The branch next to the head is called the brow-antler and the branch next above, the bez-antler.

Antlers of Fossil Elk (Cervus giganteus).

ANT'LERED, a. Furnished with antlers.

AN'TLIA, n. [Gr. ανα, up and τληναι, to draw.] The oral instrument of Lepidopterous insects, used for suction.

ANT'LIKE, a. Resembling the habits of ants.

ANTO'NIAN, a. Noting certain medicinal waters in Germany, at or near Tonstein.

ANTONOMA'SIA, } n. [Gr. αντι, and ANTONOM'ASY, } ονομα, name.] The use of the name of some office, dignity, profession, science, or trade, instead of the true name of the person; as, when his majesty is used for a king, lordship for a nobleman. Thus instead of Aristotle, we say, the philosopher; a grave man is called a Cato; an eminent orator, a Cicero; a wise man, a Solomon. In the latter examples, a proper name is used for an appellative; the application being supported by a resemblance in character.

ANTOSIAN'DRIAN, n. One of a sect of rigid Lutherans, so denominated from their opposing the doctrines of Osiander. This sect deny that man is made just, but is only imputatively just, that is, pronounced so.

AN'TRUM, n. [Lat.] A cave. Among anat., a term used to denote several cavities of the body; as the antrum genæ, or that in the cheek-bone; the antrum buccinosum, the cochlea of the ear.

A'NUS, n. [Lat.] The fundament or termination of the rectum. Its office is to form an outlet to the fæces. In bot., the posterior opening of a monopetalous flower.

AN'VIL, n. [Sax. anfilt, ænfilt; D. aanbeeld; Old Eng. anvelt. The first syllable seems to be the preposition on, from the Belgic dialect aan. The last syllable is from the verb build; in Germ. bilden, to form or shape, and bild, an image or form, which in Dutch is beeld. To build is to shape, to form, and anvil, that is, on build, is that on which things are shaped. The Latin word incus, incudis, is formed by a like analogy from in and cudo, to hammer, or shape; and the same ideas are connected in the Celtic; W. eingion; Ir. inneon, anvil, and inneonam, to strike.] An iron block with a smooth face, on which smiths hammer and shape their work. Figuratively, any thing on which blows are laid.—To be on the anvil, is to be in a state of discussion, formation, or preparation; as, when a scheme or measure is forming, but not matured. This figure bears an analogy to that of discussion, a shaking or beating.

ANXI'ETY, n. (angzi'ety.) [L. anxietas, from anxius, solicitous; L. ango. See ANGER.] 1. Concern or solicitude respecting some event, future or uncertain, which disturbs the mind, and keeps it in a state of painful uneasiness. It expresses more than uneasiness or disturbance, and even more than trouble or solicitude. It usually springs from fear, or serious apprehension of evil, and involves a suspense respecting an event, and often a perplexity of mind, to know how to shape our conduct.—2. In med. language, uneasiness; unceasing restlessness in sickness.

ANX'IOUS, a. (ank'shus.) Greatly concerned or solicitous respecting something future or unknown; being in painful suspense; applied to persons; as, to be anxious for the issue of a battle.—2. Full of solicitude; unquiet; applied to things; as, anxious thoughts or labour.—3. Very careful; solicitous; as anxious to please; anxious to commit no mistake. It is followed by for or about, before the object.

ANX'IOUSLY, adv. In an anxious manner; solicitously; with painful uncertainty; carefully; unquietly.

ANX'IOUSNESS, n. The quality of being anxious; great solicitude.

AN'Y, a. (en'ny.) [Sax. anig, ænig; This word is a compound of an, one, and ig, which, in the Teutonic dialects, is the ic of the Latins, mus-ic-us, Any is unic-us, one-like.] 1. One indefinitely.

Nor knoweth any man the Father, save the Son; Matth. xi.

If a soul shall sin against any of the commandments; Lev. iv.

2. Some; an indefinite number, plurally; for though the word is formed from one, it often refers to many. Are there any witnesses present? The sense seems to be a small, uncertain number. 3. Some; an indefinite quantity; a small portion.

Who will show us any good; Ps. iv.

4. It is often used as a substitute, the person or thing being understood.

And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any; Mark xi.

If any lack wisdom, let him ask it of God; James i.

It is used in opposition to none. Have you any wheat to sell? I have none.

AN'Y-WISE, is sometimes used adverbially, but the two words may be separated, and used with a preposition, in any-wise.

AO'NIAN, a. [From Aonia, a part of Bœotia, in Greece.] Pertaining to the muses, or to Aonia, in Bœotia. The Aonian fount was Aganippe, at the foot of Mount Helicon, not far from Thebes, and sacred to the muses. Hence the muses were called Aonides. Dryden's Virgil, Eclogue 10, 12. But in truth, Aonia itself is formed from the Celtic aon, a spring or fountain, [the fabled son of Neptune,] and this word gave name to Aonia. As the muses were fond of springs, the word was applied to the muses, and to mountains which were their favourite residence, as to Parnassus.

A'ORIST, n. [Gr. αοριστος, indefinite, of α priv. and ὁρος, limit.] The name of certain tenses in the grammar of the Greek language, which express time indeterminate, that is, either past, present, or future.

AORIST'IC, a. Indefinite; pertaining to an aorist, or indefinite tense.

AOR'TA, n. [Gr. αορτη, the great artery; also an ark, or chest.] The great artery, or trunk of the arterial system; proceeding from the left ventricle of the heart, and giving origin to all the arteries, except the pulmonary arteries. It first rises, when it is called the ascending aorta; then makes a great curve, when it gives off branches to the head, and upper extremities; then proceeds downward, called the descending aorta, when it gives off branches to the trunk; and finally divides into the two iliacs, which supply the pelvis and lower extremities.

AORT'AL, a. Pertaining to the aorta, or great artery.

AORTI'TIS, n. Inflammation of the aorta.

AOU'TA, n. The paper-mulberry tree, in Otaheite, from whose bark is manufactured a cloth worn by the inhabitants.

APĀCE, adv. [a and pace.] With a quick pace; quick; fast; speedily; with haste; hastily; applied to things in motion or progression; as, birds fly apace; weeds grow apace.

AP'AGOGE, } n. [Gr. from απαγω, to AP'AGOGY, } draw aside, of απο, from, and αγω, to drive.] 1. In logic, abduction; a kind of argument, wherein the greater extreme is evidently contained in the medium, but the medium not so evidently in the lesser extreme, as not to require farther proof. Thus, "All whom God absolves are free from sin; but God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin." The first proposition is evident; but the second may require further proof, as that God received full satisfaction for sin, by the suffering of Christ.—2. In math., a progress or passage from one proposition to another, when the first, having been demonstrated, is employed in proving others.—3. In the Athenian law, the carrying a criminal, taken in the fact, to a magistrate.

APAGOG'ICAL, a. An apogogical demonstration is an indirect way of proof, by showing the absurdity or impossibility of the contrary.

APA'GYNOUS, a. [Gr. ἅπαξ, once, and γυνη, a female.] A term applied to a plant that fructifies but once, perishing immediately after it flowers. It is the same as monocarpic.

APALACH'IAN, a. Pertaining to the Apalaches, a tribe of Indians, in the western part of Georgia. Hence the word is applied to the mountains in or near their country, which are in fact the southern extremity of the Alleghanean ridges.

APAN'THROPY, n. [Gr. απο, from, and ανθρωπος, man.] An aversion to the company of men; a love of solitude.

APARITH'MESIS, n. [Gr.] In rhet., enumeration.

APÄRT, adv. [a. and part; Fr. aparté. See PART.] 1. Separately; at a distance; in a state of separation, as to place.

Jesus departed thence into a desert place apart; Mat. xiv.

2. In a state of distinction, as to purpose, use, or character.

The Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself; Ps. iv.

3. Distinctly; separately; as, consider the two propositions apart.—4. Aside; in exclusion of; as, apart from all regard to his morals, he is not qualified, in other respects, for the office he holds.

APÄRTMENT, n. [Fr. appartement, of ab or a, from, and partir, to depart. See PART.] A room in a building, a division in a house, separated from others by partitions; a place separated by inclosure.

APATHET'IC, a. Void of feeling; free from passion; insensible.

AP'ATHIST, n. One destitute of feeling.

AP'ATHY, n. [Gr. α priv. and παθος, passion.] Want of feeling; an utter privation of passion, or insensibility to pain; applied either to the body or the mind. As applied to the mind, it is stoicism, a calmness of mind incapable of being ruffled by pleasure, pain, or passion. In the first ages of the Church, the Christians adopted the term to express a contempt of earthly concerns.

Quietism is apathy disguised under the appearance of devotion. Ency.

AP'ATITE, n. [from Gr. απαταω, to deceive; it having been often mistaken for other minerals.] A variety of phosphate of lime; generally crystallized in low, flat, hexahedral prisms, sometimes even tabular. Its powder phosphoresces on burning coals. The phosphorite of Werner includes the massive and earthy varieties of the phosphate, which are distinguished from the apatite, by their containing a small portion of fluoric acid.

APAUME'E, n. [Fr.] A heraldic term used to express a hand open and extended, so as to show the palm.

Apaumee.

APE, n. [D. aap; Dan. abe; Sax. apa; Ice. ape; W. ab, or epa, so named from the celerity of its motions.] 1. A genus of quadrumana, found in the torrid zone of both continents, of a great variety of species. In common use, the word extends to all the tribe of monkeys and baboons; but in zool., ape is limited to such of these animals as have no tails; while those with short tails are called baboons, and those with long ones, monkeys. These animals have four cutting teeth in each jaw, and two canine teeth, with obtuse grinders. The feet are formed like hands, with four fingers and a thumb, and flat nails. Apes are lively, full of frolic and chatter, generally untamable, thieving, and mischievous. They inhabit the forests, and live on fruits, leaves, and insects.—2. One who imitates servilely, in allusion to the manners of the ape; a silly fellow.

Long-armed Ape.

APE, v. t. To imitate servilely; to mimic, as an ape imitates human actions. Weak persons are always prone to ape foreigners.

APEAK, adv. [a and peak, a point. See PEAK.] 1. On the point; in a posture to pierce.—2. In seamen's language, perpendicular. The anchor is apeak, when the cable is drawn so as to bring the ship directly over it.

APELL'OUS, a. [Gr. α, without, and L. pellis, a skin.] Destitute of skin.

AP'ENNINE, a. [L. apenninus; ad and penninus, an epithet applied to a peak or ridge of the Alps. Celtic pen or ben, the peak of a mountain, or in general, a mountain.] Pertaining to or designating a chain of mountains, which extend from the plains of Piedmont, round the gulph of Genoa, to the centre of Italy, and thence south-east to the extremity.

AP'ENNINE, AP'ENNINES, n. The mountains above described.

APEP'SY, n. [Gr. α priv. and πεπτω, to digest.] Defective digestion; indigestion.

A'PIASTER, n. [From apis, a bee.] The bird called a bee-eater, a species of Merops. The apiaster has an iron-coloured back, and a belly of bluish green.

APIAS'TRUM, n. [From apis, a bee.] The mountain balm, of which bees are fond.

A'PICES, A'PEXES. See APEX and ANTHER.

API'CULATED, a. [L. apex, a sharp point.] In bot., a term applied to a leaf, or any other part which is suddenly terminated by a distinct point.

APIECE, adv. [a and piece.] To each; noting the share of each; as, here is an orange apiece.

APIOCRIN'ITES, n. [Gr. απιον, a pear, and κρινον, a lily.] A pear like, lily-shaped animal, so named from its resembling a pear, belonging to the division of fossil Crinoidea, which are said to form the connecting link between the ancient animal and vegetable worlds.

A'PIS, n. In myth., an ox, worshipped in ancient Egypt, or a divinity or idol in the figure of an ox.

A'PIS, n. [L.] In zool., the bee, a genus of insects of the order of Hymenopters. The mouth has two jaws, and a proboscis infolded in a double sheath; the wings are four, the two foremost covering the hinder ones when at rest. The females and working bees have a sting. No fewer than 55 species of the bee family have been enumerated by Linnæus.

A'PISH, a. [See APE.] Having the qualities of an ape; inclined to imitate in a servile manner; hence, foolish, foppish, affected, trifling, insignificant; as, an apish fellow; apish manners.

A'PISHLY, adv. In an apish manner; with servile imitation; foppishly.

A'PISHNESS, n. The quality of being apish; mimickry; foppery.

APLANAT'IC, a. [Gr. α neg. and πλαναω, to wander.] An aplanatic telescope is one which entirely corrects the aberration of the rays of light. It is thus distinguished from the achromatic, which only partially corrects the aberration.

APLÔME, n. [Gr. ἁπλοος, simple.] A mineral closely allied to garnet. It is considered by Jameson as crystallized common garnet. It is a rare mineral, found in dodecahedrons, with rhombic faces, supposed to be derived from the cube, by one of the most simple laws of decrement, that of a single range of particles, parallel to all the edges of a cube.

APLUS'TER, } n. [L. from Gr. αφλαστον,
APLUS'TRE, } the summit of the poop of a ship.] An ensign, or ornament carried by ancient ships. It was shaped like a plume of feathers, fastened on the neck of a goose or swan, and to this was attached a party-coloured ribbon, to indicate the course of the wind.

Apo, [Gr. απο.] A prefix found in words originally Greek, signifying from. It is etymologically the same as the Latin ab.

APOC'ALYPSE, n. (apoc'alyps.) [Gr. from αποκαλυπτω, to disclose; απο and καλυπτω, to cover.] Revelation; discovery; disclosure. The name of a book of the New Testament, containing many discoveries of predictions respecting the future state of Christianity, written by St. John, in Patmos, near the close of the first century.

APOCALYP'TIC, } a. Containing
APOCALYP'TICAL, } or pertaining to revelation; disclosing.

APOCALYP'TICALLY, adv. By revelation; in the manner of disclosure.

APOCARP'OUS, a. [Gr. απο, and καρπος, fruit.] In bot., a term applied to a flower, the carpels of which either do not adhere to each other at all, as in the crow-foot or ranunculus; or only by the ovaries, as in nigella.

APOCATAS'TASIS, n. [Gr.] In astron., the period of a planet, or the time employed in returning to the same point of the zodiac from which it set out.

APOCATHAR'SIS, n. [From απο, and καθαιρω, to cleanse.] A purgation, whether upwards or downwards.

APOCENO'SIS, n. [Gr. απο, and κενοω, to empty.] A flow or evacuation of any humour; also, an order of diseases, characterized by a flux of blood, or other fluid without pyrexia.

APOC'OPATE, v. t. [See APOCOPE.] To cut off, or drop the last letter or syllable of a word.

APOC'OPATED, pp. Shortened by the omission of the last letter or syllable.

APOC'OPATING, ppr. Cutting off, or omitting the last letter or syllable.

APOC'OPE, } n. [Gr. αποκοπη, abscis-
APOC'OPY, } sion, of απο, and κοπτω, to cut.] The cutting off, or omission of the last letter or syllable of a word; as, di for dii.

APOC'RISARY, n. [Gr. from αποκρισις, answer; αποκρινομαι, to answer.] Anciently a resident in an imperial city, in the name of a foreign church or bishop, answering to the modern nuncio. He was a proctor, in the emperor's court, to negotiate, and transact business for his constituent.

APOCRUST'IC, n. A medicine which constringes, and repels the humours; a repellent.

APOC'RYPHA, n. [Gr. from αποκρυπτω, απο, and κρυπτω, to conceal.] Literally, such things as are not published; but in an appropriate sense, books whose authors are not known; whose authenticity, as inspired writings, is not admitted, and which are therefore not considered a part of the sacred canon of the Scripture. When the Jews published their sacred books, they called them canonical and divine; such as they did not publish, were called apocryphal. The apocryphal books are received by the Romish Church as canonical, but not by Protestants.

APOC'RYPHAL, a. Pertaining to the apocrypha; not canonical; of uncertain authority or credit; false; fictitious.

APOC'RYPHALLY, adv. Uncertainly; not indisputably.

APOC'RYPHALNESS, n. Uncertainty, as to authenticity; doubtfulness of credit or genuineness.

AP'ODAL, a. [See APODE.] Without feet; in zool., destitute of ventral fins.

APODE, or AP'ODAL, n. [Gr. α priv. and πους, ποδος, foot.] An animal that has no feet, applied to certain fabulous fowls, which are said to have no legs, and also to some birds that have very short legs. In zool., the Apodes are an order of fishes, which have no ventral fins; the first order in Linnæus' system, and the fourth in that of Cuvier. To this order belong the eel, the wolf-fish, the sword-fish, the lance, &c.

Apodal—sword-fish.

APODIC'TIC, } a. [Gr. αποδειξις,
APODIC'TICAL, } evidence, of απο, and δεικνυμι, to show.] Demonstrative; evident beyond contradiction; clearly proving.

APODIC'TICALLY, adv. So as to be evident beyond contradiction.

APODIX'IS, n. [Gr.] Full demonstration.

APOD'OSIS, n. [Gr.] The latter part of a period, which explains or gives meaning to the protasis, or former part, also the application or latter part of a similitude.

AP'ODONS, n. plur. A generic term for animals without feet.

AP'ODYTERIUM, [Gr. αποδυτηριον.] Among the ancients, the undressing room for the bathers before they entered the bath.

AP'OGEE, n. [apogeon, apogeum; Gr. απο, from and γη, the earth.] That point in the orbit of a planet, which is at the greatest distance from the earth. The ancients regarded the earth as fixed in the centre of the system, and therefore assigned to the sun, with the planets, an apogee; but the moderns, considering the sun as the centre, use the terms perihelion and aphelion, to denote the least and greatest distance of the planets from that orb. The sun's apogee, therefore, is in strictness, the earth's aphelion. Apogee is properly applicable to the moon.

APOGEU'SIS, n. [Gr. απο, and γευομαι, to taste.] A generic term, including the various disorders of the sense of taste.

APO'GON, n. A fish of the Mediterranean, the summit of whose head is elevated.

AP'OGRAPH, n. [Gr. απογραφον, απογραφη.] An exemplar; a copy or transcript.

APOLLINA'RIAN, a. [From Apollo.] The Apollinarian games, in Roman antiquity, were celebrated in honour of Apollo; instituted A. R. 542, after the battle of Cannæ. They were merely scenical, with exhibitions of music, dances, and various mountebank tricks.

APOLLINA'RIANS, in Church hist., a sect, deriving their name from Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, in the 4th century, who denied the proper humanity of Christ; maintaining that his body was endowed with a sensitive, and not with a rational soul, and that the divine nature supplied the place of the intellectual principle in man.

APOLLO, n. [Gr. Απολλων.] In ancient myth., the son of Jupiter and Latona; the god of poetry, music, and prophecy; the patron of physicians, shepherds, and founders of cities. He invented the harp or lyre; and was the father of Æsculapius.

Apollo.

APOLLON'ICON, n. [Gr. Απολλων, Apollo.] A musical machine, on the principle of the organ, which, by peculiar modifications of the pipes, produced an excellent imitation of the tones of all the most admired wind instruments; the combined effect of the whole being similar to that of a numerous and well chosen orchestra. It was invented in 1817, by Messrs. Flight and Robson, London.

APOLL'YON, n. [Gr. απολλυων, destroying.] The destroyer: a name used, Rev. ix. 11, for the angel of the bottomless pit, answering to the Hebrew Abaddon.

APOLOGET'IC, } a. [Gr. απολογεομαι, to speak in APOLOGET'ICAL, } defence of; απο, and λογος, speech.] Defending by words or arguments; excusing; said or written in defence, or by way of apology; as, an apologetic essay.

APOLOGET'ICALLY, adv. By way of apology or excuse.

APOL'OGIST, n. [See APOLOGY.] One who makes an apology; one who speaks or writes in defence of another.

APOL'OGIZE, v. i. To make an apology; to write or speak in favour of; or to make excuse for; followed by for; as, my correspondent apologized for not answering my letter.

APOL'OGIZER, n. One who makes an apology, or defends.

AP'OLOGUE, n. (ap'olog.) [Gr. απολογος, a long speech, a fable.] A moral fable; a story or relation of fictitious events, intended to convey useful truths. An apologue differs from a parable in this; the parable is drawn from events which pass among mankind, and is therefore supported by probability; an apologue may be founded on supposed actions of brutes or inanimate things, and therefore does not require to be supported by probability. Æsop's fables are good examples of apologues.

APOL'OGY, n. [Gr. απολογια, of απο, and λογος, discourse.] An excuse; something said or written in defence or extenuation of what appears to others wrong, or unjustifiable: or of what may be liable to disapprobation. It may be an extenuation of what is not perfectly justifiable, or a vindication of what is or may be disapproved, but which the apologist deems to be right. A man makes an apology for not fulfiling an engagement, or for publishing a pamphlet. An apology then is a reason or reasons assigned for what is wrong or may appear to be wrong, and it may be either an extenuation or a justification of something that is or may be censured, by those who are not acquainted with the reasons. Treatises in defence of the Christian religion, in its early period, were denominated Apologies, by their authors.

APOMECOM'ETRY, n. [Gr. απο, μηκος, distance, and μετρεω, measure.] The art of measuring things distant.

APONEURO'SIS, } n. [Gr. απο, from,
APONEU'ROSY, } and νευρον, a nerve; W. nerth; Arm. nerz. See NERVE.] An expansion of a tendon in the manner of a membrane; the tendinous expansion or fascia of muscles; the tendon or tail of a muscle.

APOPEMP'TIC, a. [Gr. απο, from, and πεμπω, to send.] Denoting a song or hymn among the ancients, sung or addressed to a stranger on his departure from a place to his own country. It may be used as a noun for the hymn.

APOPH'ASIS, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φασις, form of speech.] In rhet., a waving or omission of what one, speaking ironically, would plainly insinuate; as, "I will not mention another argument, which, however, if I should, you could not refute."

APOPHLEGMAT'IC, a. [Gr. απο, from, and φλεγμα, phlegm.] Masticatory; having the quality of exciting discharges of phlegm from the mouth or nostrils.

APOPHLEGMAT'IC, n. A masticatory; a medicine which excites discharges of phlegm from the mouth or nostrils.

APOPHLEGMAT'IZANT, n. An apophlegmatic.

AP'OPHTHEGM, n. (ăp'othem.) [Gr. απο, from, and φθεγμα, word. It would be eligible to reduce this harsh word to apothem.] A remarkable saying; a short, sententious, instructive remark, uttered on a particular occasion, or by a distinguished character; as that of Cyrus, "He is unworthy to be a magistrate who is not better than his subjects;" or that of Cato, "Homines nihil agendo, discunt male agere," Men by doing nothing soon learn to do mischief.

APOPH'YGE, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and APOPH'YGY, } φυγη, flight.] 1. In arch., the part of a column where it springs out of its base, usually moulded into a concave sweep or cavetto. It is sometimes called the spring of the column. In French, it is termed congé.

APOPH'YLLITE, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φυλλον, a leaf; so called because of its tendency to exfoliate.] A mineral occurring in laminated masses, or in regular prismatic crystals, having a strong and peculiar pearly lustre. Its structure is foliated, and when a fragment is forcibly rubbed against a hard body, it separates into thin laminæ, like selenite. It exfoliates also before the flame of a lamp. From its peculiar lustre, it is sometimes called by the harsh name, ichthyophthalmite, fish-eye stone.

APOPH'YSIS, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and APOPH'YSY, } φυσις growth.] The projecting soft end or protuberance of a bone; a process of a bone. In bot., it is applied to an excrescence, or tu berele, under the base of the pericarp, or theca, of some mosses.

APOPLEC'TIC, } a. [See APOPLEXY.] Pertaining to, or consisting in apoplexy, APOPLEC'TICAL, } as an apoplectic fit; or predisposed to apoplexy, as an apoplectic habit of body.

APOPLEC'TIC, n. A person affected with apoplexy.

AP'OPLEXED, a. Affected with apoplexy.

AP'OPLEXY, n. [Gr. αποπληξια, of, απο, from, and πλησσω, to strike.] Abolition of sense and voluntary motion, from suspension of the functions of the cerebrum. Dryden, for the sake of measure, uses apoplex, for apoplexy.

APOPNIX'IS, n. [Gr. αποπνιγω, to suffocate.] Suffocation.

AP'ORON, } n. [See APORY.] A pro-
AP'ORIME, } blem difficult to be resolved.

AP'ORY, } n. [Gr. απορια, from απορος,
APO'RIA, } inops consilii, of α and πορος, way or passage.] 1. In rhet., a doubting or being at a loss where to begin, or what to say, on account of the variety of matter.—2. In the medical art, febrile anxiety; uneasiness; restlessness, from obstructed perspiration, or the stoppage of any natural secretion.

APOSIOPE'SIS, } n. [Gr. αποσιωπησις, of APOSIO'PESY, } απο, and σιωπαω, to be silent.] Reticency or suppression; as when a speaker, for some cause, as fear, sorrow, or anger, suddenly breaks off his discourse, before it is ended; or speaks of a thing, when he makes a show as if he would say nothing on the subject; or aggravates what he pretends to conceal, by uttering a part and leaving the remainder to be understood.

APOS'TASY, n. [Gr. αποστασις, a defection, of αφιστημι, to depart, απο and ιστημι.] 1. An abandonment of what one has professed; a total desertion or departure from one's faith or religion.—2. The desertion from a party to which one has adhered.—3. Among physicians, the throwing off of exfoliated or fractured bone, or the various solution of disease.—4. An abscess.

APOS'TATE, n. [Gr. αποστατης.] One who has forsaken the church, sect, or profession to which he before adhered. In its original sense, applied to one who has abandoned his religion; but correctly applied also to one who abandons a political or other party.

APOS'TATE, a. False; traitorous.

APOSTAT'ICAL, a. After the manner of an apostate.

APOS'TATIZE, v. i. To abandon one's profession or church; to forsake principles or faith which one has professed; or the party to which one has been attached.

APOS'TATIZING, ppr. Abandoning a church, profession, sect, or party

APOS'TEMATE, v. i. To form into an abscess; to swell and fill with pus.

APOSTEMA'TION, n. The formation of an aposteme; the process of gathering into an abscess; written corruptly imposthumation.

APOSTEM'ATOUS, a. Pertaining to an abscess; partaking of the nature of an aposteme.

AP'OSTEME, n. [Gr. αποστημα, from αφιστημι, to go off, to recede; απο and ιστημι, to stand.] An abscess; a swelling filled with purulent matter; written also corruptly imposthume.

A POSTERIORI, [L. posterior, after.] Arguments a posteriori, are drawn from effects, consequences, or facts; in opposition to reasoning a priori. [See A PRIORI.]

APOS'TLE, n. (apos'l.) [L. apostolus; Gr. αποστολος: from αποστελλω, to send away, of απο, and στελλω, to send; G. stellen, to set.] A person deputed to execute some important business; but appropriately, a disciple of Christ commissioned to preach the gospel. Twelve persons were selected by Christ for this purpose; and Judas, one of the number, proving an apostate, his place was supplied by Matthias, Acts i. The title of apostle is applied to Christ himself, Heb. iii. In the primitive ages of the Church, other ministers were called apostles, Rom. xvi.; as were persons sent to carry alms from one church to another, Philip. ii. This title was also given to persons who first planted the Christian faith. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France; and the Jesuit missionaries are called apostles. Among the Jews, the title was given to officers who were sent into distant provinces, as visitors or commissioners, to see the laws observed. Apostle, in the Greek liturgy, is a book containing the epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order in which they are to be read in churches through the year.

APOS'TLESHIP, n. The office or dignity of an apostle.

APOS'TOLATE, n. A mission; the dignity or office of an apostle. Ancient writers use it for the office of a bishop; but it is now restricted to the dignity of the pope, whose see is called the Apostolic See.

APOSTOL'IC, } a. Pertaining or
APOSTOL'ICAL, } relating to the apostles, as the apostolic age.—2. According to the doctrines of the apostles; delivered or taught by the apostles; as, apostolic faith or practice. Apostolic constitutions, a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, but generally supposed to be spurious. They appeared in the 4th century; are divided into eight books, and consist of rules and precepts relating to the duty of Christians, and particularly to the ceremonies and discipline of the Church. Apostolic Fathers, an appellation given to the Christian writers of the first century.

APOSTOL'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of the apostles.

APOSTOL'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being apostolical, or according to the doctrines of the apostles.

APOSTOL'ICS, n. Certain sects so called from their pretending to imitate the practice of the apostles, abstaining from marriage, from wine, flesh, pecuniary reward, &c., and wandering about clothed in white, with long beards and bare heads. Sagarelli, the founder of one of these sects, was burnt at Parma in 1300.

APOS'TROPHE, } n. [Gr. απο, from,
APOS'TROPHY, } and στροφη, a turning.] 1. In rhet., a diversion of speech; a digressive address; a changing the course of a speech, and addressing a person who is dead or absent, as if present; or a short address introduced into a discourse, directed to some person, different from the party to which the main discourse is directed; as when an advocate, in an argument to the jury, turns and addresses a few remarks to the court.—2. In grammar, the contraction of a word by the omission of a letter or letters, which omission is marked by a comma, as call'd for called. The comma used for this purpose may also be called an apostrophe.

APOS'TROPHIC, a. Pertaining to an apostrophe; noting the contraction of a word.

APOS'TROPHIZE, v. i. or t. To make an apostrophe, or short detached address in speaking; to address by apostrophy.—2. v. t. To contract a word by omitting a letter or letters.—3. To mark with a comma, indicating the omission of a letter.

APOS'TROPHIZED, pp. Addressed by way of digression; contracted by the omission of a letter or letters; marked by an apostrophy.

APOS'TROPHIZING, ppr. Addressing in a digression; contracting or marking by apostrophy.

APOTAC'TITE, n. [Gr. αποτακτος, from αποτασσω, to renounce; απο and ταττω, to ordain.] One of a sect of ancient Christians, who, in imitation of the first believers, renounced all their effects and possessions.

APOTHE'CA, n. [L.] An apothecary's shop; also, among the ancients, a storehouse, warehouse, or cellar, where corn, wine, oil, &c. were deposited.

APOTH'ECARY, n. [L. and Gr. apotheca, a repository, from αποτιθημι, to deposit or lay aside, or from θηκη, a chest.] 1. One who practises pharmacy; one who prepares drugs for medicinal uses, and keeps them for sale. Formerly, the apothecary merely compounded and dispensed the prescriptions of the physician and surgeon. The term is now, however, also applied in England to those who practise in medicine, and, at the same time, deal in drugs.—2. In the middle ages, an apothecary was the keeper of any shop or warehouse; and an officer appointed to take charge of a magazine.

AP'OTHEGM, n. [See APOPHTHEGM.] A remarkable saying; a short, instructive remark.

APOTHEGMAT'IC, } a. In the APOTHEGMAT'ICAL, } manner of an apothegm.

APOTHEG'MATIST, n. A collector or maker of apothegms.

APOTHEG'MATIZE, v. t. To utter apothegms, or short instructive sentences.

AP'OTHEME, n. [See APOTHECARY.] In Russia, an apothecary's shop, or a shop for the preparation and sale of medicines.

APOTHE'OSIS, n. [Gr. αποθεωσις, of απο, and Θεος, God.] Deification; consecration; the act of placing a prince or other distinguished person among the heathen deities. This honour was often bestowed on illustrious men in Rome, and followed by the erection of temples, and the institution of sacrifices to the new deity.

APOTHE'OSIZE, v. t To consecrate, or exalt to the dignity of a deity; to deify.

APOTH'ESIS, n. [Gr. απο, and τιθημι, to put back.] 1. The reduction of a dislocated bone.—2. A place on the south side of the chancel in the primitive churches, furnished with shelves, for books, vestments, &c.

APOT'OME, } n. [Gr. αποτεμνω, to cut
APOT'OMY, } off.] 1. In math., the difference between two incommensu-rable quantities, or which are commensurable only in power. Such is the difference between 1 and $\sqrt{2}$, or the difference between the side of a square and its diagonal.—2. In music, that portion of a tone major which remains after deducting from it an interval, less by a comma, than a semitone major. The difference between a greater and lesser semitone, expressed by the ratio 128 : 125. The Greeks supposing the greater tone could not be divided into two equal parts, called the difference, or smaller part, apotome; the other limma.

APOTREP'SIS, n. [Gr. απο, and τρεπω, to turn.] The resolution of a suppurating tumour.

AP'OTROPY, n. [Gr. απο, and τρεπω, to turn.] In ancient poetry, a verse or hymn composed for averting the wrath of incensed deities. The deities invoked, were called apotropeans.

APPAL', v. t. [Fr. palir; L. palleo, to become pale. See PALE.] 1. To depress or discourage with fear; to impress with fear, in such a manner that the mind shrinks, or loses its firmness; as, the sight appalled the stoutest heart.—2. To reduce, allay, or destroy; as, to appal thirst. [Unusual.]

APPAL', v. i. To grow faint; to be dismayed.

APPALL'ED, pp. Depressed or disheartened with fear; reduced.

APPALL'ING, ppr. Depressing with fear; reducing.—2. a. Adapted to depress courage.

APPALL'INGLY, adv. In a manner to appal.

APPALL'MENT, n. Depression occasioned by fear; discouragement.

AP'PANAGE, n. [Fr. apanage, an estate assigned to a younger son for his maintenance; an appendix, dependence, appurtenance; It. appannaggio, an appendage. If this word is from the panage, panagium, of the middle ages, it is from panis, food, provision; It. panaggio, provision. This is probably the true origin of the word.] 1. Lands appropriated by a prince to the maintenance of his younger sons, as their patrimony; but on condition of the failure of male offspring, they were to revert to the donor or his heir. From the appanage, it was customary for the sons to take their surnames.—2. Sustenance; means of nourishing.

Wealth—the appanage of wit. Swift.

APPARA'TUS, n. [L. from apparo, to prepare, of ad and paro; formerly we had in English apparate.] 1. Things provided as means to some end; as the tools of an artizan; the furniture of a house; instruments of war. In more technical language, a complete set of instruments or utensils, for performing any operation or experiment, or for practising any art, as chemical apparatus, philosophical apparatus, surgical apparatus, &c.—2. In surg., the operation of cutting for the stone, of three kinds, the small, the great, and the high.—3 In phys., applied to a catenation of organs, all ministering to the same function; as, the respiratory apparatus, the digestive apparatus. Apparatus, is also used as the title of several books in the form of catalogues, bibliothecas, glossaries, dictionaries, &c. Apparatus, is also the plural; though some writers use Apparatuses.

APPAREILLE, n. The slope or ascent to a bastion.

APPAR'EL, n. [Fr. appareil, from parer, to dress or set off; L. paro, apparo, to prepare; Arm. para; Ch. Heb. ברא, bara; Ar. bara.] 1. Clothing; vesture; garments; dress.—2. External habiliments or decorations; appearance; as, religion appears in the natural apparel of simplicity.

Glorious in apparel; Is. lxiii.

3. The furniture of a ship, as sails, rigging, anchors, &c.

She did apparel her apparel. Shak.

3. To dress with external ornaments; to cover with something ornamental; to cover as with garments; as, trees apparelled with flowers, or a garden with verdure.—4. To furnish with external apparatus; as, ships apparelled for sea.

APPAR'ELLED, pp. Dressed; clothed; covered as with dress; furnished.

APPAR'ELLING, ppr. Dressing; clothing; covering as with dress; furnishing.

APPA'RENCE,† / APPA'RENCY,† } n. Appearance.

APPA'RENT, a. [See APPEAR.] 1. That may be seen, or easily seen; visible to the eye; within sight or view.—2. Obvious; plain; evident; indubitable; as, the wisdom of the Creator is apparent in his works.—3. Visible, in opposition to hid or secret; as, a man's apparent conduct is good.—4. Visible; appearing to the eye; seeming, in distinction from true or real, as the apparent motion or diameter of the sun. Heirs apparent, are those whose right to an estate is indefeasible, if they survive the ancestor; in distinction from presumptive heirs, who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would inherit, but whose right is liable to be defeated by the birth of other children. According to the law of Scotland, an apparent heir is the person to whom the succession has actually opened, and who remains apparent heir until his regular entry, in Clare Constat. Apparent, among mathematicians and astronomers, is used to signify things or objects as they appear to us, in contradistinction from real or true, in regard to their distance, magnitude, place, figure, motion, &c. Apparent conjunction of the planets, is when they appear to be placed in the same straight line with the eye of the spectator. Apparent diameter of a heavenly body, is the angle which its diameter subtends at the eye; that is, the angles made by lines drawn from its extremities to the eye. Apparent magnitude of an object is the magnitude as it appears to the eye, the measure of which is the quantity of the optic angle. Apparent altitude of a heavenly body. [See ALTITUDE.] Apparent motion, that motion which we perceive in a distant body that is moving, whilst the eye is either at rest or in motion; or that motion which an object at rest seems to have, whilst the eye itself only is in motion. Apparent figure, the figure or shape under which an object appears when seen at a distance. Apparent distance, that distance which we judge an object to be from us when seen afar off; which may be very different from the real distance. Apparent place of a planet, &c., is that point in the surface of the sphere of the world, where the centre of the luminary appears when seen from the surface of the earth. Apparent horizon, the same as visible horizon. [See HORIZON.] Apparent time. [See TIME.] Apparent place of an object, in optics, is that in which it appears, when seen in or through glass, water, or other refracting mediums, which is commonly different from the true place. Apparent place of the image of an object, in catoptrics, is that where the image of an object made by the reflection of a speculum appears to be.

APPA'RENTLY, adv. Openly; evidently; as, the goodness of God is apparently manifest in his works of providence.—2. Seemingly; in appearance; as, a man may be apparently friendly, yet malicious in heart.

APPA'RENTNESS, n. Plainness to the eye or the mind; visibleness, obviousness.

APPARI"TION, n. [See APPEAR.] 1. In a general sense, an appearance; visibility. [Little used.]—2. The thing appearing; a visible object; a form.—3. A ghost; a spectre; a visible spirit. [This is now the usual sense of the word.]—4. Mere appearance, opposed to reality. In astr., apparition signifies a star or other luminary's becoming visible, which before was hid; as, when a heavenly body appears above the horizon, or rises heliacally. Circle of apparition, that circle or imaginary line within which the stars are always visible in any given latitude, in distinction from the circle of occultation.

APPAR'ITOR, n. [L. apparo, to prepare, or appareo, to attend.] Among the Romans, any officer who attended magistrates and judges to execute their orders. In England, a messenger or officer who serves the process of a spiritual court, or a beadle in the university who carries the mace.

APPAY,† v. t. [Sp. and Port. apagar.] To satisfy. [See PAY.]

APPEACH,† v. t. To accuse; to censure or reproach. [See IMPEACH.]

APPEACHMENT,† n. Accusation; charge exhibited.

APPEAL, v. i. [Fr. appeler; It. appellare; L. appello; ad and pello, to drive or send; Gr. βαλλω. We do not see the sense of call in pello, but to drive or press out, is the radical sense of calling, naming. This word coincides in elements with L. balo, Eng. bawl, and peal.] 1. To refer to a superior judge or court, for the decision of a cause depending, or the revision of a cause decided in a lower court.

I appeal to Cesar; Acts xxi.

2. To refer to another for the decision of a question controverted, or the counteraction of testimony or facts; as, I appeal to all mankind for the truth of what is alleged.

APPEAL, v. t. To call or remove a cause from an inferior to a superior judge or court. This may be done after trial and judgment in the lower court; or by special statute or agreement, a party may appeal before trial, upon a fictitious issue and judgment. We say, the cause was appealed before or after trial.

APPEAL, v. t. In crim. law, to charge with a crime; to accuse; to institute a criminal prosecution for some heinous offence; as, to appeal a person of felony. This process was anciently given to a private person to recover the weregild, or private pecuniary satisfaction for an injury he had received by the murder of a relation, or by some personal injury.

APPEAL, n. The removal of a cause or suit from an inferior to a superior tribunal, as from a common pleas court to a superior or supreme court. Also, the right of appeal.–2. In Scots law, the term is confined to the act of bringing a decision of the court of session under a review of the House of Lords.—3. An accusation; a process instituted by a private person against a man for some heinous crime by which he has been injured, as for murder, larceny, mayhem or main.—3. A summons to answer to a charge.–4. A call upon a person; a reference to another for proof or decision. In an oath, a person makes an appeal to the Deity for the truth of his declaration.—5. Resort; recourse.

Every milder method is to be tried, before a nation makes an appeal to arms. Kent.

APPEALABLE, a. That may be appealed; that may be removed to a higher tribunal for decision; as, the cause is appealable.–2. That may be accused or called to answer by appeal: applied to persons; as, a criminal is appealable for manslaughter.

APPEALANT,† n. One who appeals.

APPEALED, pp. Removed to a higher court, as a cause; prosecuted for a crime by a private person, as a criminal.

APPEALER, n. One who appeals; an appellor.

APPEALING, ppr. Removing a cause to a higher tribunal; prosecuting, as a private person for an offence; referring to another for a decision.

APPEAR, v. i. [L. appareo, of ad and pareo, to appear, or be manifest: Fr. apparoir, apparaître.] 1. To come or be in sight; to be in view; to be visible.

The leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh; Lev. xiii.

And God said, Let the dry land appear; Gen. i.

2. To become visible to the eye, as a spirit, or to the apprehension of the mind; a sense frequent in scripture.

The Lord appeared to Abram and said; Gen. xii.

The angel of the Lord appeared to him in a flame of fire out of the midst of the bush; Ex. iii.

3. To stand in presence of, as parties or advocates before a court, or as persons to be tried. The defendant, being called, did not appear.

We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ; 2 Cor. v.

4. To be obvious; to be known, as a subject of observation or comprehension.

Let thy work appear to thy servant; Ps. xc.

It doth not yet appear what we shall be; 1 John iii.

5. To be clear or made clear by evidence; as, this fact appears by ancient records.

But sin that it might appear sin; Rom. vii.

6. To seem, in opposition to reality.

They disfigure their faces that they may appear to men to fast; Mat. vi.

7. To be discovered or laid open.

That thy shame may appear, Jer. xiii.

APPEAR,† n. Appearance.

APPEARANCE, n. The act of coming into sight; the act of becoming visible to the eye; as, his sudden appearance surprised me.–2. The thing seen; a phenomenon; as, an appearance in the sky.—3. Semblance; apparent likeness.

There was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire; Num. ix.

4. External show; semblance assumed, in opposition to reality or substance; as, we are often deceived by appearances; he has the appearance of virtue.

For man looketh on the outward appearance; 1 Sam. xvi.

5. Personal presence; exhibition of the person; as, he made his first appearance at court or on the stage.—6. Exhibition of the character; introduction of a person to the public in a particular character; as, a person makes his appearance in the world, as an historian, an artist, or an orator.—7. Probability; likelihood. This sense is rather an inference from the third or fourth; as, probability is inferred from external semblance or show.—8. Presence; mien; figure; as presented by the person, dress or manners; as, the lady made a noble appearance.–9. A being present in court; a defendant's filing common or special bail to process. In Scots law, the stating of a defence in a cause. Where a defender in writing, or by counsel at the bar, states a defence, he is said to have appeared.—10 An apparition.—In astr., and experimental philosophy, an appearance is usually called a phenomenon, and appearances phenomena. Appearance, in perspect., is the representation or projection of a figure, body, or the like object, on the perspective plane.

APPEARER, n. The person that appears.

APPEARING, ppr. Coming in sight; becoming evident; making an external show; seeming; having the semblance APPEASABLENESS, n. The quality of being appeasable.

APPEASE, v. t. (s as z) [Fr. apaiser, of ad and paix, peace; L. pax. See PEACE.] To make quiet; to calm; to reduce to a state of peace; to still; to pacify; as, to appease the tumult of the ocean, or of the passions; to appease hunger or thirst. [This word is of a general application to every thing in a disturbed, ruffled or agitated state.]

APPEASED, pp. Quieted; calmed; stilled; pacified.

APPEASEMENT, n. The act of appeasing; the state of being in peace.

APPEASER, n. One who appeases or pacifies.

APPEASIVE, a. Having the power to appease; mitigating; quieting.

APPEL'LANT, n. [See APPEAL.] 1. One who appeals, or removes a cause from a lower to a higher tribunal.—2. One who prosecutes another for a crime.—3. One who challenges or summons another to single combat.—4. In church hist., one who appeals from the constitution Unigenitus to a general council.

APPEL'LATE,† n. A person appealed, or prosecuted for a crime. [See APPELLEE.]

APPEL'LATE, a. Pertaining to appeals; having cognizance of appeals; as, "appellate jurisdiction."

Appellate judges. Burke, Rev. in France.

APPELLA'TION, n. [L. appellatio. See APPEAL.] Name; the word by which a thing is called and known. Spenser uses it for appeal.

APPEL'LATIVE, a. Pertaining to a common name; noting the common name of a species.

APPEL'LATIVE, n. A common name in distinction from a proper name. A common name or appellative stands for a whole class, genus or species of beings, or for universal ideas. Thus man is the name of the whole human race, and fowl of all winged animals. Tree is the name of all plants of a particular class; plant and vegetable are names of things that grow out of the earth. A proper name, on the other hand, stands for a single thing, as, London, Paris, Philadelphia, Washington.

APPEL'LATIVELY, adv. According to the manner of nouns appellative; in a manner to express whole classes or species; as, Hercules is sometimes used appellatively, that is, as a common name to signify a strong man.

APPEL'LATORY, a. Containing an appeal.

APPELLEE', n. The defendant in an appeal. 2. The person who is appealed, or prosecuted by a private man for a crime.

APPELLOR', n. The person who institutes an appeal, or prosecutes another for a crime. This word is rarely or never used for the plaintiff in appeal from a lower court, who is called the appellant. Appellee is opposed both to appellant and appellor. In Scots law, respondent is opposed to appellant, the appellant being the party by whom an appeal is made, and the respondent the other party in the proceedings in the House of Lords.

APPEND', v. t. [L. appendo, of ad and pendeo, to hang.] 1. To hang or attach to, as by a string, so that the thing is suspended; as, a seal appended to a record.–2. To add, as, an accessory to the principal thing.

APPEND'AGE, n. Something added to a principal or greater thing, though not necessary to it, as a portico to a house.

Modesty is the appendage of sobriety. Taylor.

APPEND'ANCE,† } n. Something an-APPEND'ENCE,† } nexed.

APPEND'ANT, n. Hanging to; annexed; belonging to something; attached; as, a seal appendant to a paper.—2. In law, common appendant, is a right, belonging to the owners or occupiers of land, to put commonable beasts upon the lord's waste, and upon the lands of other persons within the same manor. An advowson appendant, is the right of patronage or presentation, annexed to the possession of a manor. So also a common of fishing may be appendant to a freehold.

APPEND'ANT, n. That which belongs to another thing, as incidental or subordinate to it.

APPEND'ED, pp. Annexed; attached.

APPEN'DENCY, n. That which is by right annexed.

APPEND'ICATE,† v. t. To append; to add to.

APPENDICA'TION,† n. An appendage or adjunct.

APPEND'ICLE, n. A small appendage.

APPENDI'CULATE, a. (L. appendiculatus] A term applied to leaves, leaf-stalks, &c. that are furnished with an additional organ for some particular purpose, as the inclosing of insects, water, &c. The leaves of the Dionæa Muscipula, and the leaf of the Nepenthes distillatorea, have organs of this sort.

APPEND'ING, n. That which is by right annexed.

APPEND'IX, n. plur. appendixes. [L. The Latin plural is appendices. See APPEND.] 1. Something appended or added.

Normandy became an appendix to England. Hale.

2. An adjunct, concomitant, or appendage.—3. More generally, a supplement or short treatise added to a book.

APPERCEIVE,† v. t. [Fr. apercevoir.] To comprehend.

APPERCEP'TION, n. [ad and perception.] Perception that reflects upon itself; consciousness.

APPER'IL,† n. Peril; danger.

APPERTAIN, v. i. [Fr. appartenir; It. appartenere; L. ad and pertineo, to pertain, of per and teneo, to hold. Pertineo is to reach to, to extend to, hence to belong. See TENANT.] To belong, whether by right, nature, or appointment.

Give it to him to whom it appertaineth; Rev. vi.

[See PERTAIN.]

APPERTAINING, ppr. Belonging.

APPERTAIN'ING, n. That which belongs to a thing.

APPERTAINMENT, n. That which belongs.

APPER'TENENCE, n. See APPURTENANCE.

APPER'TINENT, a. Belonging; now written appurtenant.

APPER'TINENT,† n. That which belongs to something else. [See APPURTENANCE.]

AP'PETENCE, AP'PETENCY, n. [L. appetentia, appetens, from appeto, to desire; of ad and peto, to ask, supplicate or seek; Ch. פטר; peet, Eth. fatoo, to desire, to intreat; Dan. beder; D. bidden; Eng. bid; Sax. bidan; L. invito, compound. The primary sense is to strain, to urge or press, or to advance. See BID.] 1 In a general sense, desire; but especially, carnal desire; sensual appetite.—2. The disposition of organized bodies to select and imbibe such portions of matter as serve to support and nourish them, or such particles as are designed, through their agency, to carry on the animal or vegetable economy.

These lacteals have mouths, and by animal selection or appetency they absorb such part of the fluid as is agreeable to their palate. Darwin.

3. An inclination or propensity in animals to perform certain actions, as in the young to suck, in aquatic fowls to enter into water and to swim.—4. According to Darwin, animal appetency is synonymous with irritability or sensibility; as the appetency of the eye for light, of the paps to secrete milk, &c. —5. Attraction, or the tendency in bodies to move toward each other and unite.

AP'PETENT, a. Desiring; very desirous.

APPETIBIL'ITY, n. The quality of being desirable for gratification.

AP'PETIBLE, a. [Low L. appetibilis, from appeto.] Desirable; that may be the object of sensual desire.

AP'PETITE, n. [L. appetitus, from appeto. See APPETENCE.] 1. The natural desire of pleasure or good; the desire of gratification, either of the body or of the mind. Appetites are passions directed to general objects, as the appetite for fame, glory, or riches; in distinction from passions directed to some particular objects, which retain their proper name, as the passion of love, envy or gratitude. Passion does not exist without an object; natural appetites exist first, and are then directed to objects.—2. A desire of food or drink.—3. Strong desire; eagerness or longing.—4. The thing desired.

Power being the natural appetite of princes. Swift.

Appetites are natural or artificial. Hunger and thirst are natural appetites; the appetites for olives, tobacco, snuff, &c. are artificial. In old authors, appetite is followed by to, but regularly it should be followed by for before the object, as an appetite for pleasure. To be given to appetite, is to be voracious or gluttonous; Prov. xxiii. 2.

APPETI''TION, n. [L. appetitio.] Desire. [Rarely used.]

AP'PETITIVE, a. That desires; that has the quality of desiring gratification; as appetitive power or faculty.

AP'PIAN, a. Designating something that belongs to Appius, particularly a way from Rome through Capua to Brundusium, now Brindisi, constructed by Appius Claudius, A. R. 441. It is more than 330 miles in length, formed of hard stones squared, and so wide as to admit two carriages abreast.

APPLAUD', v. t [L. applaudo; ad and plaudo, to make a noise by clapping the hands; Fr. applaudir. This word is formed on the root of laus, laudo; Eng. loud; W. clod, praise, from llod, what is forcibly uttered; llodi, to reach out; from llawd, that shoots out. It coincides also with W. bloez, a shout, or outcry; bloeziaw, to shout; blozest, applause, acclamation. Ir. bluadh, a shout; bladh, praise. These may all be of one family. See LOUD.] 1. To praise by clapping the hands, acclamation, or other significant sign.—2. To praise by words, actions, or other means; to express approbation of; to commend; used in a general sense.

APPLAUD'ED, pp. Praised by acclamation, or other means; commended.

APPLAUD'ER, n. One who praises or commends.

APPLAUD'ING, ppr. Praising by acclamation; commending.

APPLAUSE, n. (s as z.) [L. applausus.] A shout of approbation; approbation and praise, expressed by clapping the hands, acclamation or huzzas; approbation expressed. In antiq., applause differed from acclamation; applause was expressed by the hands, and acclamation by the voice. There were three species of applause, the bombus, a confused din made by the hands or mouth; the imbrices, and testæ, made by beating a sort of sounding vessels in the theatres. Persons were appointed for the purpose of applauding, and masters were employed to teach the art. The applauders were divided into choruses, and placed opposite to each other, like the choristers in a cathedral.

APPLAU'SIVE, a. Applauding; containing applause.

AP'PLE, n. [Sax. appl, appil; D. appel; W. aval; Ir. abhal or ubhal; Arm. aval; This word primarily signifies fruit in general, especially of a round form. In Pers. the same word pronounced ubhul, signifies the fruit or berries of the savin or juniper. In Welsh, it signifies not only the apple, but the plum and other fruits. Aval melynhir, a lemon; aval euraid, an orange.] 1. The fruit of the apple-tree, [Pyrus malus,] from which cider is made.—2. The apple of the eye is the pupil.—Apple of love, or love apple, the tomato, or lycopersicom, a species of Solanum. The stalk is herbaceous, with oval, pinnated leaves, and small yellow flowers. The berry is smooth, soft, of a yellow or reddish colour, and one to three inches in diameter. It is used in soups and broths.

AP'PLE, v. t. To form like an apple.

AP'PLE-GRAFT, n. A scion of the apple tree engrafted.

AP'PLE-HARVEST, n. The gathering of apples, or the time of gathering.

AP'PLE-PIE, n. A pie made of apples stewed or baked, inclosed in paste, or covered with paste, as in England.

AP'PLE-SAUCE, n. A sauce made of stewed apples.

AP'PLE-TART, n. A tart made of apples baked on paste.

AP'PLE-TREE, n. A tree arranged by Linnæus under the genus Pyrus, section Pomaceæ, of the nat. order Rosaceæ. The fruit of this tree is indefinitely various. The crab apple is supposed to be the original kind, from which all others have sprung. New varieties are springing annually from the seeds.

AP'PLE-WOMAN, n. A woman who sells apples and other fruit

AP'PLICABLE, a. That may be applied; fit to be applied, as related to a thing; that may have relation to something else; as, this observation is applicable to the case under consideration.

AP'PLICABLENESS, n. Fitness to be applied; the quality of being applicable.

AP'PLICABLY, adv. In such a manner that it may be applied.

AP'PLICANCY, n. The state of being applicable.

AP'PLICANT, n. One who applies; one who makes request; a petitioner.

The applicant for a cup of water declares himself to be the Messias. Plumtree.

The court require the applicant to appear in person. Z. Swift.

AP'PLICATE, n. A right line drawn across a curve, so as to be bisected by the diameter; an ordinate.

Applicate-Ordinate.

APPLICA'TION, n. [L. applicatio. See APPLY.] 1. The act of laying on; as, the application of emollients to a diseased limb.—2. The thing applied; as, the pain was abated by the application.—3. The act of making request or soliciting; as, he made application to the court of chancery.—4. The act of applying, as means; the employment of means; as, children may be governed by a suitable application of rewards and punishments. This is the first signification directed to moral objects.—5. The act of fixing the mind; intenseness of thought; close study; attention; as, to injure the health by application to study.

Had his application been equal to his talents, his progress might have been greater. J. Jay.

6. The act of directing or referring something to a particular case, to discover or illustrate the agreement or disagreement; as, I make the remark, and leave you to make the application.—7. In theol., the act by which the merits of Christ are transferred to man, for his justification.—8. In geom., a division for applying one quantity to another, whose areas, but not figures, shall be the same; or the transferring a given line into a circle or other figure, so that its ends shall be in the perimeter of the figure; also the act of bringing one thing near to another for the purpose of measuring it. Thus a larger space is measured by the continual application of a less, as a yard by a foot or inch. Application, in geom., is also used for the act or supposition of putting or placing one figure upon another, to ascertain whether they be equal or unequal. This method is adopted in the fourth and eighth propositions of the first book of Euclid's elements. Application of one science to another, signifies the use that is made of the principles of the one for augmenting and perfecting the other. Thus, algebra has been applied to Geometry, and vice versa; and both are made use of in illustrating and demonstrating the principles of mechanics, astronomy, navigation, &c.—9. In sermons, that part of the discourse, in which the principles before laid down and illustrated, are applied to practical uses.

AP'PLICATIVE, a. That applies.

AP'PLICATORY, a. That includes the act of applying.

AP'PLICATORY, n. That which applies.

APPLIED, pp. Put on; put to; directed; employed.

APPLI'EDLY,† adv. In a manner which may be applied.

APPLY', v. t. [L. applico, of ad and plico, to fold or knit together; Fr. appliquer; W. plegy, to bend or fold; Arm. plega, to fold or plait; pleca, a fold; Gr. πλεκω, to knit, or twist; Sax. plegan, plegian, pleggan, to play, to bend or to apply, incumbere; D. plooi, a fold; ploojen, to plait; Eng. ply, display, and employ. The word plegy, plico, is formed from the root of lay, Sax. lecgan. The sense then is to lay to; and it is worthy of remark, that we use lay to in the precise sense of ply and apply. It is certain from the Welsh that the first consonant is a prefix.] 1. To lay on; to put one thing to another; as, to apply the hand to the breast; to apply medicaments to a diseased part of the body. In geom., to transfer or place a given line, either in a circle or some other figure, so that the extremities of the line shall be in the perimeter of the figure.—2. To use or employ for a particular purpose, or in a particular case; as, to apply a sum of money to the payment of a debt.—3. To put, refer, or use, as suitable or relative to something; as, to apply the testimony to the case.—4. To fix the mind; to engage and employ with attention; as, "Apply thy heart to instruction." —5. To address or direct; as, "Sacred vows applied to Pluto."—6. To betake; to give the chief part of time and attention; as, to apply one's self to the study of botany. This is essentially the fourth sense.—7. To make application; to have recourse by request; as, to apply one's self to a counsellor for advice. This is generally used intransitively; as, to apply to a counsellor.—8 † To busy; to keep at work; to ply. [Superseded by ply, which see.]

APPLY', v. i. To suit; to agree; to have some connection, agreement, or analogy; as, this argument applies well to the case.—2. To make request; to solicit; to have recourse with a view to gain something; as, to apply to government for an office; I applied to a friend for information.

APPLY'ING, ppr. Laying on; making application.

[This is the usual sense of the word.] 3. Suspicious; inclined to believe; as, I am apprehensive he does not understand me.—4. Sensible; feeling; perceptive. [Rarely used.]

APPREHEN'SIVELY, adv. In an apprehensive manner.

APPREHEN'SIVENESS, n. The quality of being apprehensive; readiness to understand; fearfulness.

APPREN'TICE, n. [Fr. apprenti, an apprentice, from apprendre, to learn; L. apprehendo. See APPREHEND.] A young person of either sex, bound by indenture, to serve some particular individual, or company of individuals, for a specified time, in order to learn some art, science, trade, profession, or manufacture, in which his master or masters become bound to instruct him.—2. In old law books, a barrister; a learner of law.

APPREN'TICE, v. t. To bind to, or put under the care of a master, for the purpose of instruction in the knowledge of a trade or business.

APPREN'TICEHOOD,† n. Apprenticeship.

APPREN'TICESHIP, n. The term for which an apprentice is bound to serve his master. The length of this term, as well as the amount of apprentice fee, the recompense given to the apprentice, &c., must depend on the nature of the employment, and the particular agreement of the parties. By a statute passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, it was enacted, that no person should exercise any trade, craft, or mystery in England, unless he had previously served to it an apprenticeship of seven years at least. This enactment, however, was repealed in 1814, although the repeal did not interfere with the existing rights, privileges, or bye-laws of the different corporations; but wherever these do not interfere, the formation of apprenticeships, and their duration, are left to be adjusted by the parties themselves. In Scotland, the term varies from three to seven years.—2. The service, state, or condition of an apprentice; a state in which a person is gaining instruction under a master.

APPREN'TISAGE,† n. Apprenticeship.

APPREST' or APPRES'SED, a. [ad and pressed.] In bot., pressed close; lying near the stem; or applying its upper surface to the stem.

APPRISE, v. t. (s as z.) [Fr. appris, participle of apprendre, to learn, or inform. See APPREHEND.] To inform; to give notice, verbal or written; followed by of; as, we will apprise the general of an intended attack; he apprised the commander of what he had done.

APPRISED, pp. Informed; having notice or knowledge communicated.

APPRISING, ppr. Informing; communicating notice to.

APPRI'SING, n. In Scots law, the name of an action by which a creditor formerly became invested with the estate of his debtor for payment.

APPRIZE, v. t. [This word is usually written appraise, as if deduced from the Italian apprezzare. There is no other word from which it can regularly be formed; the French apprecier, being recognized in appreciate. But apprize, the word generally used, is regularly formed, with ad, from price, prize; D. prys; Ger. preis; W. pris; or from the Fr. priser, to prize, and this is the more correct orthography.] To value; to set a value, in pursuance of authority. It is generally used for the act of valuing by men appointed for the purpose under direction of law, or by agreement of parties; as, to apprize the goods and estate of a deceased person. The private act of valuing is ordinarily expressed by prize.

APPRIZED, pp. Valued; having the worth fixed by authorized persons.

APPRIZEMENT, n. The act of setting a value under some authority or appointment; a valuation.—2. The rate at which a thing is valued; the value fixed, or valuation; as, he purchased the article at the apprizement.

APPRIZER, n. A person appointed to rate, or set a value on articles. When apprizers act under the authority of law, they must be sworn.

APPRIZING, ppr. Rating; setting a value under authority.

APPRIZING, n. The act of valuing under authority.

APPROACH, v. i. [Fr. approcher; It. approcciare, from Fr. proche, near. The Latin proximus contains the root, but the word, in the positive degree, is not found in the Latin. It is from a root signifying to drive, move, or press toward; probably ברך, berek.] 1. To come or go near, in place; to draw near; to advance nearer.

Wherefore approached ye so nigh the city? 2 Sam. xi.

2. To draw near in time.

And so much the more as ye see the day approach; Heb. x.

3. To draw near, in a figurative sense to advance near to a point aimed at, in science, literature, government, morals, &c.; to approximate; as he approaches to the character of the ablest statesman.—4. To draw near in duty as in prayer or worship.

They take delight in approaching to God; Isaiah li.

APPROACH, v. t To come near to: as, Pope approaches Virgil in smoothness of versification. This use of the word is elliptical, to being omitted, so that the verb can hardly be said to be transitive. The old use of the word, as "approach the hand to the handle," is not legitimate.—2. To have access carnally; Lev. xviii.—3. In gardening, to ingraft a sprig or shoot of one tree into another, without cutting it from the parent stock.

APPROACH, n. The act of drawing near; a coming or advancing near; as, he was apprised of the enemy's approach.—2. Access; as, the approach to kings.—3. In forti., not only the advances of an army are called approaches, but the works thrown up by the besiegers, to protect them in their advances towards a fortress.—Curve of equal approach, in math., a curve down which a body descending by the force of gravity, makes equal approaches to the horizon in equal portions of time. Method of approaches, in alge., a method of resolving certain problems relating to square numbers, &c.

APPROACHABLE, a. That may be approached; accessible.

APPROACH'ABLENESS, n. The state of being approachable.

APPROACHER, n. One who approaches or draws near.

APPROACHING, ppr. Drawing nearer; advancing towards.

APPROACH'LESS, a. That cannot be approached.

APPROACHMENT, n. The act of coming near. [Little used.]

AP'PROBATE, a. [L. approbatus.] Approved.

AP'PROBATE, v. t. [L. approbo, to approve, of ad and probo, to prove or approve. Approbate is a modern word, but in common use in America. It differs from approve, denoting not only the act of the mind, but an expression of the act. See PROOF, APPROVE, and PROVE.] To express approbation of; to manifest a liking, or degree of satisfaction; to express approbation officially, as of one's fitness for a public trust.

Mr Hutchinson approbated the choice. J. Eliot.

Approbate and reprobate. In Scots law, a person is said to approbate and reprobate who takes advantage of one part of a deed, but rejects the rest; as for example, where a disposition on death-bed revokes a previous liege poustie conveyance to the prejudice of the heir-at-law, but still gives the estate past the heir. The heir who challenges this deed ex capite lecti, in so far as it defeats his interest in the estate, but who abides by it in so far as it revokes the liege poustie deed to his prejudice, is said to approbate and reprobate the deed. But this is contrary to law.

AP'PROBATED, pp. Approved; commended.

AP'PROBATING, ppr. Expressing approbation of.

APPROBA'TION, n. [L. approbatio. See PROOF and PROVE.] 1. The act of approving; a liking; that state or disposition of the mind, in which we assent to the propriety of a thing, with some degree of pleasure or satisfaction; as, the laws of God require our approbation.—2. Attestation; support; that is, active approbation, or action, in favour of what is approved.—3. The commendation of a book licensed or permitted to be published by authority, as was formerly the case in England

AP'PROBATIVE, a. Approving; implying approbation.

AP'PROBATORY, a. Containing approbation; expressing approbation.

APPROMPT',† for Prompt.

APPROOF',† n. Approval.

APPRO'PERATE,† v. t. [L. appropero.] To hasten.

APPROPIN'QUATE,† v. i. [L. appropinquo.] To draw near.

APPROPINQUA'TION,† n. A drawing nigh.

APPROPINQUE',† v. i To approach.

APPRO'PRIABLE, a. [From appropriate.] That may be appropriated; that may be set apart, sequestered, or assigned exclusively to a particular use.

APPRO'PRIATE, v. t. [Fr. approprier, of L. ad and proprius, private, peculiar. See PROPER.] 1. To set apart for, or assign to a particular use, in exclusion of all other uses; as, a spot of ground is appropriated for a garden.—2. To take to one's self in exclusion of others; to claim or use as by an exclusive right; as, let no man appropriate the use of a common benefit.—3. To make peculiar; as, to appropriate names to ideas.—4. To sever an ecclesiastical benefice, and annex it to a spiritual corporation, sole or aggregate, being the patron of the living.

APPRO'PRIATE, a. Belonging peculiarly; peculiar; set apart for a particular use or person; as, religious worship is an appropriate duty to the Creator.—2. Most suitable, fit or proper; as, to use appropriate words in pleading.

APPRO'PRIATED, pp. Assigned to a particular use; claimed or used exclusively; annexed to an ecclesiastical corporation.

APPRO'PRIATENESS, n. Peculiar fitness; the quality of being appropriate, or peculiarly suitable.

APPRO'PRIATELY, adv. In an appropriate or proper manner.

APPRO'PRIATING, ppr. Assigning to a particular person or use; claiming or using exclusively; severing to the perpetual use of an ecclesiastical corporation.

APPROPRIA'TION, n. The act of sequestering, or assigning to a particular use or person, in exclusion of all others; application to a special use or purpose; as, of a piece of ground, for a park; of a right, to one's self; or of words, to ideas.—2. In law, the severing or sequestering of a benefice to the perpetual use of a spiritual corporation, sole or aggregate, being the patron of the living. For this purpose must be obtained the king's license, the consent of the bishop and of the patron. When the appropriation is thus made, the appropriator and his successors become perpetual parsons of the church, and must sue and be sued in that name.

APPRO'PRIATIVE, a. That appropriates.

APPRO'PRIATOR, n. One who appropriates.—2. One who is possessed of an appropriated benefice.

APPRO'PRIETARY, n. A lay possessor of the profits of a benefice.

APPROV'ABLE, a. [See APPROVE.] That may be approved; that merits approbation.

APPROV'ABLENESS, n. The quality of being approvable.

APPROV'AL, n. Approbation. [See APPROVE.]

APPROV'ANCE, n. Approbation. [See APPROVE.]

APPROVE', v. t. [Fr. approuver; L. approbo; of ad and probo, to prove or approve. See APPROBATE, PROVE, and PROOF.] 1. To like; to be pleased with; to admit the propriety of; as, we approve the measures of administration. This word may include, with the assent of the mind to the propriety, a commendation to others.—2. To prove; to show to be true; to justify.

Would'st thou approve thy constancy? Approve first thy wisdom. Milton.

[This sense, though common a century or two ago, is now rare.]—3.† To experience; to prove by trial. [See PROVE.]—4. To make or show to be worthy of approbation; to commend.

Jesus, a man approved of God; Acts ii.

This word seems to include the idea of Christ's real office, as the Messiah, and of God's love and approbation of him in that character.—5. To like and sustain as right; to commend.

Yet their posterity approve their sayings; Ps. xlix.

This word, when it signifies to be pleased, is often followed by of, in which use it is intransitive; as, I approve of the measure. But the tendency of modern usage is to omit of: "I approve the measure."—6. To improve.

APPROV'ED, pp. Liked; commended; shown or proved to be worthy of approbation; having the approbation and support of.

Study to show thyself approved to God; 2 Tim. ii.

Not he that commendeth himself is approved; 2 Cor. x.

An approved bill, in mercantile law and usage, is a bill to which no reasonable objection can be made.

APPROVE'MENT, n. Approbation; liking.—2. In law, when a person indicted for felony or treason, and arraigned, confesses the fact before plea pleaded, and appeals or accuses his accomplices of the same crime, to obtain his pardon, this confession and accusation are called approvement, and the person an approver.—3. Improvement of common lands, by inclosing and converting them to the uses of husbandry.

APPROV'ER, n. One who approves. Formerly one who approves or makes trial.—2. In law, one who confesses a crime and accuses another. [See APPROVEMENT.] Also, formerly, one who had the letting of the king's domains, in small manors. In Stat. 1 Edw. III. c. 8, sheriffs are called approvers. A bailiff or steward of a manor.

APPROV'ING, ppr Liking; commending; giving or expressing approbation.

APPROV'ING, a. Yielding approbation; as, an approving conscience.

APPROV'INGLY, adv. By approbation.

APPROX'IMANT,† a. Approaching.

APPROX'IMATE, a. [L. ad and proximus, next. See APPROACH.] Nearest to; next; near to. In bot, an epithet applied to a leaf that stands close to the stem. [This word, except in the botanical sense, is superseded by proximate.]

APPROX'IMATE, v. t. To carry or advance near; to cause to approach.

To approximate the inequality of riches to the level of nature. Burke. Aikin. Shenstone.

APPROX'IMATE, v. i. To come near; to approach.

APPROX'IMATED, pp. Carried, or advanced near.

APPROX'IMATING, ppr. Advancing near; causing to approach.

APPROXIMA'TION, n. Approach; a drawing, moving, or advancing near.—2. In math., a continual approach, or coming nearer and nearer to a root, or other quantity sought, when no process is known for arriving at it exactly. But, although, by such an approximation the exact value of a quantity cannot be found, a value may be obtained sufficiently correct for all practical purposes. Thus the diagonal of a square whose sides are represented by unity is $\sqrt{2}$, the exact value of which cannot be obtained, but its approximate value may be substituted in the nicest calculations. In short, by approximation the error may be reduced to a quantity less than any that can be assigned. This process is the basis of many calculations in pure and applied mathematics, and is of frequent use and great importance in all practical operations.—3. In med., communication of disease by contact.—4. A mode of cure by transplanting a disease into an animal or vegetable by immediate contact.

APPROX'IMATIVE, a. Approaching; that approaches.

APPUI', n. [Fr.] In horsemanship, a stay upon the hand, that is, a reciprocal action between the mouth of the horse and the hand of the rider, the bit and rein forming the line of communication. Thus a horse with a sensitive mouth has a good appui, and the same may be said of the rider if his hand be good.

APPULSE, n. (appuls'.) [L. appulsus, of ad and pello, to drive.] 1. The act of striking against; as, in all consonants there is an appulse of the organs.—2. In astr., the approach of any planet to a conjunction with the sun, or a star.—3. Arrival; landing.

APPUL'SION, n. The act of striking against by a moving body.

APPUL'SIVE, a. Striking against; driving towards; as, the appulsive influence of the planets.

APPULS'IVELY, adv. By appulsion.

APPUR'TENANCE, n. So written for appertenence. [Fr. appartenance. See APPERTAIN.] That which belongs to something else; an adjunct; an appendage. Appropriately, such buildings, rights, and improvements, as belong to land, are called the appurtenances; as, small buildings are the appurtenances of a mansion.

APPUR'TENANT, a. Belonging to; pertaining to of right.—2. In law, common appurtenant is that which is annexed to land, and can be claimed only by prescription or immemorial usage, on a legal presumption of a special grant.

A'PRICATE, v. i. [L. apricor.] To bask in the sun. [Lit. us.]

APRIC'ITY, n. Sunshine. [Lit. us.]

A'PRICOT, n. Old orthography, apricock. [W. bricyllen; Arm. brigesen; Fr. abricot, whence the present orthography. Junius and Skinner allege that the Italians formerly wrote the word bericoco, berricoccoli. At present they write it albicocca, and the Spaniards albaricoque, which indicate the word to be formed of albus and coccus, white berry; Sp. albar, white. But apricot seems to be formed from the old orthography.] A fruit belonging to the genus Prunus, of the plum kind, of an oval figure and delicious taste. It is the prunus Armeniaca or Armeniaca vulgaris, and belongs to the natural order Rosaceæ. Apricot trees are chiefly raised against walls, and propagated by grafting upon plum tree stocks.

A'PRIL, n. [L. aprilis; Fr. avril; Sp. abril; Ir. abrail; Corn. ebril; W. ebrill.] The fourth month of the year.

A'PRIL-FOOL, n. One who suffers an imposition on the first of April.

A Priori. [L.] The opposite of A Posteriori, a mode of reasoning by which we proceed from the cause to the effect. To demonstrate any thing a priori, means to do it on grounds or reasons preceding actual knowledge or independent of it. Mathematical proofs, for example, are of the a priori kind. On the contrary, judgments or proofs founded on knowledge previously acquired, such as the conclusions of natural history and of all experimental science, are termed a posteriori. In nat. theol., we reason a priori when we infer the existence of a God from the general difficulties in the supposition of the existence of the frame of nature on any other hypothesis; but we reason a posteriori when we infer the same from marks of intelligent contrivance and design in the works of creation. This latter mode of reasoning with regard to the existence of deity is the safest, the soundest, and the best adapted to the capacity of the generality of mankind.

A'PRON, n. [Ir. aprun; a or ag, and Celtic bron, the breast.] 1. A cloth or piece of leather worn on the fore part of the body, to keep the clothes clean, or defend them from injury.—2. The fat skin covering the belly of a goose.—3. In gunnery, a flat piece of lead that covers the vent of a cannon.—4. In ships, a piece of curved timber, just above the foremost end of the keel.—5. A platform, or flooring of plank, at the entrance of a dock, on which the dock-gates are shut.—6. A piece of leather or other thing to be spread before a person riding in a gig, chaise, &c. so as to defend him from rain, snow, or dust. In plumbing, a term used in the north of England and in Scotland for flashing, q. v.

A'PRONED, a. Wearing an apron.

A'PRON-LINING, n. The cover of the apron-piece.

A'PRON-MAN, n. A man who wears an apron; a labouring man; a mechanic.

A'PRON-PIECE, n. A piece of timber fixed into a wall and projecting horizontally to support the carriage pieces and joistings in the half spaces or landings of a staircase. It is also called pitching piece.

AP'ROPOS, adv. (ap'ropo.) [Fr. à and propos, purpose.] 1. Opportunely; seasonably.—2. By the way; to the purpose; a word used to introduce an incidental observation, suited to the occasion, though not strictly belonging to the narration.

AP'SIS, n. plur. Apsides. [Gr. ἁψις, connection, from ἁπτω, to connect.] 1. In astr., the apsides are the two points of a planet's orbit, which are at the greatest and least distance from the sun or earth; the most distant point is the aphelion or apogee; the least distant the perihelion or perigee. The line connecting these is called the line of the apsides.—2. The ring or compass of a wheel.—3. In arch., a term applied to that part of any building which has a semicircular or polygonal termination and a vaulted roof.—4. In eccles. arch., the apsis is the eastern portion of the church where the clergy sat, and where the altar was placed. It had a circular or polygonal termination, and was vaulted over. The bishop's throne was anciently called the apsis gradata.—5. The arched roof of a room or of an oven.—6. The reliquary for the relics of saints.

APT', a. [L. aptus, from apto, to fit; Gr. ἁπτω, to tie; Sax. hæp.] 1. Fit; suitable; as, he used very apt metaphors.—2. Having a tendency; liable; used of things; as, wheat on moist land is apt to blast or be winter-killed.—3. Inclined; disposed customarily; used of persons; as, men are too apt to slander others.—4. Ready; quick; used of the mental powers; as, a pupil apt to learn; an apt wit.—5. Qualified; fit.

> All the men of might, strong and apt for war; 2 Kings xxiv.

APT,† v. t. To fit; to suit or adapt.

APT'ABLE,† a. That may be adapted.

AP'TATE,† v. i. To make fit.

AP'TER, AP'TERA, n. [Gr. α priv. and πτερον, a wing.] An insect without wings. The Aptera, constituting the seventh order of insects in Linnæus' system, comprehend many genera. To it belong spiders, fleas, earwigs, &c.; also, lobsters, crabs, prawns, and shrimps. But later zoologists have made a very different distribution of these animals.

AP'TERAL, a. [supra.] Destitute of wings. In arch., a temple having no columns along its flanks or sides.

AP'TERYX AUSTRA'LIS, n. [Gr. α priv. and πτερυξ, a wing.] An extraordinary bird of New Zealand, without wings, supposed to be already extinct. The skins are still worn as ornaments by the natives.

APT'ITUDE, n. [of aptus, apt.] 1. A natural or acquired disposition for a particular purpose, or tendency to a particular action or effect; as, oil has an aptitude to burn; men acquire an aptitude to particular vices.—2. Fitness; suitableness.—3. Aptness; readiness in learning; docility.

APTITU'DINAL, a. Containing aptitude.

APTITU'DINALLY, adv. In an aptitudinal manner.

APT'LY, adv. In an apt or suitable manner; with just correspondence of parts; fitly; properly; justly; pertinently.

APT'NESS, n. Fitness; suitableness; as, the aptness of things to their end.—2. Disposition of the mind; propensity; as, the aptness of men to follow example.—3. Quickness of apprehension; readiness in learning; docility; as, an aptness to learn is more observable in some children than in others.—4. Tendency in things; as, the aptness of iron to rust.

AP'TOTE, n. [Gr. α priv. and πτωσις, case.] In gram., a noun which has no variation of termination, or distinction of cases; an indeclinable noun.

A'PUS, or A'POUS, n. A constellation near the south pole, having eleven stars according to Bayer; also a name given to the martinet.

AP'YREXY, n. [Gr. α priv. and πυρεσσω, to be feverish, from πυρ, fire.] The absence or intermission of fever.

APY'ROUS, a. [Gr. απυρος, α priv. and πυρ, fire.] Incombustible, or that sustains a strong heat without alteration of form or properties.

Apyrous bodies differ from those simply refractory. Refractory bodies can not be fused by heat, but may be altered.

A'QUA, n. [L. aqua; It. acqua, water; Arm. eagui, to water, or steep; Goth. ahwa, water, which in Saxon is reduced to ea; G. and D. ei, in eiland; Fr. eau; W. gwy or aw; Ir. oig or oiche] Water; a word much used in pharmacy, and the old chemistry.—Aqua fortis, in the old chemistry, is now called nitric acid.—Aqua marina, a name which jewellers give to the beryl, on account of its colour.—Aqua regia, in the old chemistry, is now called nitro-muriatic acid.—Aqua vitæ, a name familiarly applied to native distilled spirits. It answers to the whisky of Scotland, the usque'baugh of Ireland, the eau de vie or brandy of the French, and the geneva of the Dutch.

AQUALEG'IA, n. Literally the water-gatherer, because its leaves collect water in their hollow. A small genus of plants, commonly called columbines, belonging to the crow-foot tribe, of which several species are cultivated in gardens.

AQUA'RIAN, n. One of a sect of Christians, in the primitive church, who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine; either under a pretence of abstinence, or because it was unlawful to drink wine.

AQUA'RIUS, n. [L.] The Water bearer; a sign in the zodiac which the sun enters about the 21st of January; so called from the rains which prevail at that season, in Italy and the East. The stars in this constellation, according to Ptolemy, are 45; according to Tycho Brahe, 41; according to Hevelius, 47; and according to Flamstead, 108.

AQUAT'IC, a. [L. aquaticus. See AQUA.] Pertaining to water; applied to animals which live in water, as fishes; or to such as frequent it, as aquatic fowls; applied to plants, it denotes such as grow in water. Aquatical is rarely used.

AQUAT'IC, n. A plant which grows in water, as the Flag.

AQ'UATILE, a. That inhabits the water. [Rarely used.]

AQUATINT'A, n. [aqua, water, and It. tinta, dye. See TINCTURE.] A method of etching on copper, by which a beautiful effect is produced, resembling a fine drawing in water colours or Indian ink. This is performed with a powder of asphalt and fine transparent resin sifted on the plate, which is a little greased; the loose powder being shaken off, the plate is heated over a chafing dish; and when cool, the light places on the plate are covered with a hair pencil, dipped in turpentine varnish mixed with ivory black. A rim is then raised with bees' wax, and reduced nitrous acid is poured on, and suffered to stand five minutes; then poured off, and the plate dried. This process with the pencil and the aqua fortis is to be repeated till the darkest shades are produced.

A'QUA TOFA'NA, n. A poisonous fluid invented about the middle of the 17th century, by an Italian woman of the name of Tofana, who is said to have procured the death of no fewer than 600 individuals by means of it. It consisted chiefly of a solution of crystallized arsenic.

Aquæ Ductus et Aquæ Haustum. In Scots law, are two servitudes; the former consists in a right of carrying a water-course through the grounds of another; the latter, of watering cattle at a river, well, or pond, in the ground of another.

AQ'UEDUCT, n. [L. aqua, water, and ductus, a pipe or canal, from duco, to lead. See DUKE.] A structure made for conveying water from one place to another over uneven ground; either above or under the surface. It may be either a pipe or a channel. It may be constructed above ground of stone or wood; carried through hills by piercing them, and over valleys, by a structure supported by props or arches. Some have been formed with three conduits on the same line, elevated one above another. Aqueducts were most extensively used by the Romans, and on the sites, or in the vicinities of their most important cities. The principal Roman aqueducts now remaining, are the aqua Virginia, repaired by Pope Paul IV., and the aqua Felice, constructed by Sextus V. The aqueduct of Segovia in the Spanish province of old Castile, is one of the most admired works of antiquity.

A'QUEOUS, a. Watery; partaking of the nature of water, or abounding with it. Aqueous humour of the eye, the limpid watery fluid which fills the space between the cornea and the crystalline lens in the eye. [See EYE.] Aqueous vapour, the gaseous vapour which is produced from the surface of water by the action of heat, winds, and other causes, and which rises into the atmosphere, and returns again to the earth in the form of rain, dew, and snow.

A'QUEOUSNESS, n. The quality of being watery; waterishness; wateriness.

A'QUIFORM, a. In the form of water.

AQ'UILA, n. [L. whence aquilinus; from the Oriental, עקל, okel, to be crooked. This fowl is probably named from its curving beak.] In ornith., the eagle. Also, a northern constellation containing, according to the British catalogue, 71 stars.

AQ'UILATED, pp. In her., adorned with eagles' heads, as a cross aquilated.

AQ'UILINE, a. [L. aquilinus. See AQUILA.] 1. Belonging to the eagle.—2. Curving; hooked; prominent, like the beak of an eagle.

AQ'UILON, n. [L. aquilo.] The north wind.

AQUITA'NIAN, a. Pertaining to Aquitania, one of the great divisions of Gaul, which, according to Cesar, lay between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the ocean. In modern days, it has been called Gascony. The inhabitants in Cesar's time, spoke a different dialect from that of the proper Celts, between the Garonne and Seine. This dialect bore an affinity to the Basque, in Biscay, to which they were contiguous; and some remains of it still exist in the Gascon. Aquitania is the country of the Aqui; from the name of the people, with tan, a Celtic word, signifying region or country. The Romans, either from their general usage, or from not understanding the Celtic tan, annexed another termination signifying country, ia, the Ir. ai or aoi, Heb. אי ai, a settlement or habitation; Gr. αια, land, country; Hindu, eya, the same.

A. R. stand for anno regni, the year of the king's reign; as, A. R. G. R. 20, in the 20th year of the reign of king George.

AR'ABESQUE, a. [See ARABIAN.] 1. In the manner of the Arabians; applied to ornaments consisting of imaginary foliage, stalks, plants, &c., in which there are no figures of animals.—2.† The Arabic language.

AR'ABESQUE, n. Arabesques or moresques, are a style of ornaments composed of a whimsical mixture of flowers, fruits, buildings, and other objects, to which are joined by some artists, the figures of men, women, animals, real and imaginary monsters, &c., used in painting, in sculpture, and in architecture; but in pure ancient arabesques, such as are found in the Alhambra, no animal representations are used.

Arabesque.

ARA'BIAN, a. [See the noun.] Pertaining to Arabia.

ARA'BIAN, n. [Arab denotes a wanderer, or a dweller in a desert.] A native of Arabia; an Arab.

AR'ABIC, a. Belonging to Arabia, or the language of its inhabitants. Arabic figures or characters, the numeral characters now used in our arithmetic, which were introduced into England about the eleventh century.

AR'ABIC, n. The language of the Arabians.

AR'ACHIS, n. A genus of plants of the class and order Diadelphia Decandria. It contains only one species, the American earth-nut, of which the seeds yield an abundance of oil.

ARAC'H'NIDA, n. [Gr. αραχνη, a spider, and ειδος, form.] A class of animals, including spiders, mites, and scorpions. They are oviparous animals, provided with articulated members, but they do not undergo a metamorphosis, similar to insects. They respire either by bronchiæ, or by means of a trachea, the openings for the admission of air being stigmatiform; and they are destitute of antennæ.

ARAC'H'NIDAN, n. An animal of the tribe of spiders.

ARAC'H'NOID, a. [Gr. αραχνη, a spider, and ειδος, form; Heb. ארג, areh, to weave, that is, to stretch, to draw out; Eng. reach.] In anat., the arachnoid tunic, or arachnoid, is a semitransparent thin membrane which is spread over the brain and pia mater, and for the most part closely connected with the latter. The term has also been applied to that capsule of the crystalline lens, which is a continuation of the hyaloid membrane.

ARAC'H'NOID, n. A species of madrepore found fossil.

ARACHNOL'OGIST, n. One versed in arachnology.

ARACHNOL'OGY, n. [Gr. αραχνη, a spider, and λογος, discourse.] The science or history of spiders.

ARACHO'SIAN, a. Designating a chain of mountains which divide Persia from India.

A'RACK, n. See ARRACK.

ARÆ'OSTYLE, [Gr. αραιος, rare, and στυλος, a column.] In arch., a term applied to a columnar arrangement where the columns are placed far apart. The interval usually assigned is four diameters.

ARÆ'OSYSTYLE, [Gr. αραιος, rare, συν, together with, and στυλος, a column.] An arrangement in which the columns are coupled or placed in pairs, with an interval generally of half a diameter betwixt the coupled columns, and of three diameters and a half betwixt the pairs.

ARAIGNEE', or ARRAIGN, n. (aràin) [Fr. a spider.] In fort., the branch, return, or gallery of a mine.

ARAISE,† v. t. To raise.

ARA'LIA, n. A genus of plants with rosaceous flowers, and succulent berries. The species are natives of China and America.

ARAME'AN, a. Pertaining to Aram, a son of Shem, or to the Chaldeans.

AR'AMISM, n. An idiom of the Aramean or Chaldee language; a Chaldaism.

ARA'NEA, n. A genus of the aptera insects, belonging to the family Araneides or spiders.

ARANE'IDES, ARANE'IDÆ, ARANE'IDANS, n. [L. aranea, a spider.] The spider family, a tribe of the pulmonary order of Arachnidans, with a coriaceous integument, modified antennæ, or chelicers, consisting of a single joint armed with a claw, perforated near the apex for the transmission of venom; breathing by pulmonary sacs, which are either two or four in number, and always placed under the abdomen. The abdomen is pedicellate, and the arms are provided with four or six spinnerets.

ARANEOS'E, a. Covered with hairs crossing each other, like the rays in a spider's web.

ARA'NEOUS, a. [L. aranea, a spider, or cobweb.] Resembling a cobweb.

ARA'NEUS MARINUS, n. The fish usually called the sea-spider.

ARA'TION, n. [L. aratio.] Ploughing; tillage; lands are said to be in a state of aration, when they are under tillage.

AR'ATORY, a. That contributes to tillage.

Aratrum Terræ. In Scots law, a ploughgate of land; it consists of eight oxgates of land, because anciently the plough was drawn by eight oxen.

ARAUCA'NIAN, a. Pertaining to the Araucanians, a tribe of aboriginals, inhabiting Arauco, in Chili.

ARAUCA'RIA, n. [Araucanos, a tribe of Indians in the southern parts of Chili.] In bot., a genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Coniferæ, found in Australia and Chili. The araucaria excelsa, or Norfolk island pine, grows to the height of from 160 to 228 feet, with a circumference of sometimes more than 30 feet. Many fossil plants seem to have been allied to this genus.

ÄRBALIST, n. [From arcus, a bow, and balista, L., an engine to throw stones; Gr. βαλλω, to throw.] A cross-bow. This consists of a steel bow set in a shaft of wood, furnished with a string and a trigger; and is bent with a piece of iron. It serves to throw bullets, darts, arrows, &c.

ÄRBALISTER, n. A cross-bowman.

ÄRBALESTI'NA. Loopholes in the form of a cross, in fortified walls, through which arrows were discharged.

ÄRBITER, n. [L.] A person appointed, or chosen by parties in controversy, to decide their differences. This is its sense in the civil law. In modern usage, arbitrator is the technical word. —2. In a general sense, now most common, a person who has the power of judging and determining, without control; one whose power of deciding and governing is not limited.—3. One that commands the destiny, or holds the empire of a nation or state.

ÄRBITRABLE, a. Arbitrary; depending on the will.

ÄRBIT'RAMENT, n. Will; determination.—2. The award of arbitrators. In this sense, award is more generally used.

ÄRBITRARILY, adv. By will only; despotically; absolutely.

ÄRBITRARINESS, n. The quality of being arbitrary; despoticalness; tyranny.

ÄRBITRA'RIOUS,† a. Arbitrary; despotic.

ÄRBITRA'RIOUSLY,† adv. Arbitrarily.

ÄRBITRARY, a. [L. arbitrarius.] 1. Depending on will or discretion; not governed by any fixed rules; as, an arbitrary decision; an arbitrary punishment.

Arbitrary power is most easily established on the ruins of liberty abused to licentiousness. Washington.

2. Despotic; absolute in power; having no external control; as, an arbitrary prince, or government.

ÄRBITRATE, v. i. [L. arbitror.] To hear and decide, as arbitrators; as, to choose men to arbitrate between us.

ÄRBITRATE, v. t. To decide; to determine; to judge of.

ÄRBITRA'TION, n. The hearing and determination of a cause between parties in controversy, by a person or persons chosen by the parties. This may be done by one person; but it is usual to choose two or three; or for each party to choose one, and these to name a third, who is called the umpire. Their determination is called an award.—2. A hearing before arbitrators, though they make no award. [This is a common use of the word in the United States.]

ÄRBITRATOR, n. A person chosen by a party or by the parties who have a controversy, to determine their differences. The act of the parties in giving power to the arbitrators is called the submission, and this may be verbal or written. The person chosen as umpire, by two arbitrators, when the parties do not agree, is also called an arbitrator.—2. An arbiter, governor, or president.—3. In a more extensive sense, an arbiter; one who has the power of deciding or prescribing without control.

ÄRBITRA'TRIX, n. A female who arbitrates, or judges.

ÄRBITRESS, n. A female arbiter.

ÄR'BOR, or ÄR'BOUR, n. [The French express the sense by berceau, a cradle, an arbor, or bower; Sp. emparrado, from parra, a vine raised on stakes, and nailed to a wall. Qu. Chaucer's herber, herbewe, a lodge, coinciding with harbor, which see.] 1. A frame of lattice work, covered with vines, branches of trees, or other plants, for shade; a bower.—2. In bot., a tree, as distinguished from a shrub. The distinction which Linnæus makes, that a tree springs up with a bud on the stem, and a shrub not, is found not to hold universally; and the tree, in popular understanding, differs from the shrub only in size. Arbor forms the seventh family of vegetables in Linnæus' system. [See TREE.]—3. In mech., the principal part of a machine, sustaining the rest. Also, the axis or spindle of a machine, as of a crane, or windmill. Arbor Dianæ, a beautiful arborescent form of crystallization, produced when silver is precipitated by mercury.

ÄR'BORARY, a. Belonging to trees.

ÄR'BORATOR, n. One who plants, or who prunes trees.

ÄR'BORED, a. Furnished with an arbor.

ÄRBO'REOUS, a. [L. arboreus, from arbor.] Belonging to a tree; resembling a tree; constituting a tree; growing on trees; as moss is arboreous

ÄRBORES'CENCE, n. [L. arboresco, to grow to a tree.] The figure of a tree; the resemblance of a tree in minerals, or crystallizations, or groups of crystals in that form.

ÄRBORES'CENT, a. Resembling a tree; having the figure of a tree; dendritical.—2. From herbaceous, becoming woody.

ÄRBORES'CENT STAR-FISH, n. A species of Asterias, called also Caput Medusæ. [See STAR-FISH.]

ÄRBORET, or ARBORE'TUM, n. [It. arboreto, from arbor, a tree.] A small tree or shrub; a place in a park or pleasure ground, or in a large garden or nursery, in which a collection of trees and shrubs, one of each kind, is cultivated.

ÄRBORICUL'TURE, n. The cultivation of trees; the art of planting, dressing, and managing trees and shrubs.

ÄRBORIST, n. One who makes trees his study, or who is versed in the knowledge of trees.

ÄRBORIZA'TION, n. The appearance or figure of a tree or plant in minerals, or fossils. [See HERBORIZATION.]

ÄRBORIZE, v. t. To form the appearance of a tree or plant in minerals.

ÄR'BOROUS, a. Belonging to trees.

ÄRBOR-VINE, n. A species of bindweed.

ÄR'BOR VITÆ, n. The tree of life,

In bot., applied to the species of Thuja, belonging to the nat. order Coniferæ. In anat., a dendriform arrangement, which appears in the medullary substance of the brain, when the cerebellum is cut vertically.

ÄRBOUR. See ARBOR.

ÄRBUSCLE, n. [L. arbusculus, a little tree.] A dwarf tree, in size between a shrub and a tree.

ÄRBUS'CULAR, a. Resembling a shrub; having the figure of small trees.

ÄRBUST'IVE, a. [From arbustum.] Containing copses of trees or shrubs; covered with shrubs.

ÄRBUST'UM, n. [L. See ARBOR.] A copse of shrubs or trees; an orchard.

ÄRBUTE, n. [L. arbutus.] The strawberry tree, a genus of evergreen shrubs, belonging to the nat. order Ericeæ, and characterized by its fruit being a berry, containing many seeds. Arbutus unedo, the strawberry tree, abounds near the lakes of Killarney.

ÄRBU'TEAN, a. Pertaining to the strawberry tree.

ÄRC, or ÄRCH, n. [L. arcus, a bow, vault, or arch; arcuo, to bend; Gr. ἀρχη, beginning, origin; ἀρχω, to begin, to be the author or chief; Fr. arc, arche. The Greek word is probably from the same root as arcus, from the sense of springing or stretching, shooting up, rising, which gives the sense of a vault, or bow, as well as of chief or head. Heb. ארג, arg, to weave; Ar. aricha, ariga, to emit odour, to diffuse fragrance; and Heb. ערג, arg, to desire, or long for, to ascend. The radical sense of all these roots is, to stretch, strain, reach; Gr. ὀρεγω, L. frango; and the sense of arch is from stretching upward, ascending. From arc or arch comes the sense of bending, deviating, and cunning.] In geom., any part of the circumference of a circle or of a curve line; sometimes, but improperly, a segment or part of a circle. It is by means of circular arcs or arches, that all angles are measured; the arc being described from the angular point as a centre. Concentric arcs, are such as have the same centre. Equal arcs, are such arcs of the same circle or of equal circles, as contain the same number of degrees and parts of a degree. Similar arcs, of unequal circles, are such as contain the same number of degrees, or that are the like part or parts of their respective whole circles. Diurnal arch, is that part of a circle described by a heavenly body between its rising and setting; and the nocturnal arch, is that described betwixt its setting and rising; both these together are always equal to a whole circle. Arch of progression, or direction, is an arch of the ecliptic which a planet seems to pass over, when its motion is direct. Arch of retrogradation, is an arch of the ecliptic, described while a planet is retrograde, or moves contrary to the order of the signs. Arch of vision, is that which measures the sun's depth below the horizon, when a star, before hid by his rays, begins to appear again.

Arc.

ÄRCADE, n. [Fr. from arcus; Sp. arcada.] A long and continued arch; a series of arches, supported on piers or pillars; used generally as the screen and roof support of an ambulatory or walk: but in the architecture of the middle ages, more commonly applied as an ornamental dressing to a wall, as in the figure. The term is often improperly applied to a covered walk, or to a vault, or to a simple arched opening in a wall. Of late, there have been erected in some of our principal cities, elegant ranges of shops and warehouses, so constructed, as to form a covered lane, to which the term arcade is improperly applied.

Arcade, Romsey Church, Hampshire.

ÄRCA'DIAN, } a. Pertaining to Arca-
ÄRCA'DIC, } dia, a mountainous district in the heart of the Peloponnesus.

ÄRCA'DICS, n. The title of a book in Pausanias, which treats of Arcadia.

ÄRCĀNE, a. [L. arcanus.] Hidden, secret. [Not much used.]

ÄRCA'NUM, n. plur. arcana, [L. perhaps from arceo, to keep in.] A secret; generally used in the plural, arcana, secret things, mysteries.

ÄRCBOUTANT, n. [Fr. arc and bout. See ABOUT, ABUTMENT.] In arch., an arched buttress.

ÄRCH, n. [See ARC.] In arch., a structure composed of separate inelastic bodies, having the shape of truncated wedges, arranged on a curved line, so as to retain their position by mutual pressure. Arches are usually constructed of stones or of bricks. The separate stones which compose the arch, are called voussoirs, or arch-stones; the extreme or lowest voussoirs, are termed springers, and the uppermost, or central one, is called the key-stone. The under or concave side of the voussoirs, is called the intrados, and the upper, or convex side, the extrados of the arch. When the curves of the intrados and extrados are concentric, or parallel, the arch is said to be extradosed. The supports which afford resting and resisting points to the arch, are called piers and abutments. The upper part of the pier or abutment where the arch rests, technically, where it springs from, is the impost. The span of an arch, is in circular arches the length of its chord, and generally, the width between the points of its opposite imposts whence it springs. The rise of an arch, is the height of the highest point of its intrados above the line of the impost; this point is sometimes called the under side of the crown, the highest point of the extrados being the crown. Arches are designated in two ways; first, in a general manner, according to their properties, their uses, their position in a building, or their exclusive employment in a particular style of architecture. Thus, there are arches of equilibriation, equipollent arches, arches of discharge, askew and reversed arches, and Roman, pointed, and Saracenic arches. Second, they are named specifically, according to the curve their intrados assume, when that curve is the section of any of the geometrical solids, as circular, segmental, cycloidal, elliptical, parabolical, hyperbolical, or catenarian arches; or from the resemblance of the whole contour of the curve to some familiar object, as lancet arch, and horseshoe arch; or from the method used in describing the curve, as three-centred arches, four-centred arches, and the like. When any arch has one of its imposts higher than the other, it is said to be rampant. —2. The space between two piers of a bridge, when arched; or any place covered with an arch.—3. Any curvature in the form of an arch. —4. The vault of heaven or sky. Triumphal arches, are magnificent structures at the entrance of cities, erected to adorn a triumph and perpetuate the memory of the event.

Semicircular Arch.

Equilateral Arch.

Segmental Arch.

Horse-Shoe Arch.

Tudor or four-centred Arch.

ÄRCH, v. t. To cover with an arch; to form with a curve; as, to arch a gate.

ÄRCH, v. i. To make an arch or arches; as, to arch beneath the sand.

ÄRCH, a. [It. arcare, to bend, to arch, to cheat or deceive, from arco, L. arcus, a bow; D. arg, crafty, roguish; Sw. and Dan. arg, id. The Teutonic arg, appears to be allied to arch, and to to the Eng. rogue. The radical sense of bend is to strain.] Cunning; sly; shrewd; waggish; mischievous for sport; mirthful; as we say in popular language, roguish; as, an arch lad.

ÄRCH, a. Used also in composition. [Gr. ἀρχος, chief; Ir. arg, noble, famous.] Chief; of the first class; principal; as, an arch deed. Shakspeare uses this word as a noun; "My worthy arch and patrons;" but the use is not authorized.

ÄRCHÆOLOĠ'IC, } a. Pertaining ÄRCHAIOLOĠ'IC, } to a treatise
ÄRCHAIOLOĠ'ICAL, } on antiquity, or to the knowledge of ancient things.

ÄRCHÆOL'OĠIST, } n. One versed
ÄRCHAIOL'OĠIST, } in antiquity or ancient learning.

ÄRCHÆOL'OĠY, } n. [Gr. ἀρχαιος,
ÄRCHAIOL'OĠY, } ancient, and λογος, discourse.] The science which relates to antiquities in general; a discourse on antiquity; learning or knowledge which respects ancient times.

ÄR'CHAISM, n. [Gr. ἀρχαιος, ancient, from ἀρχη, beginning.] An ancient or obsolete phrase or expression.

ÄRCHĀNĠEL, n. An angel of the highest order; an angel occupying the eighth rank in the celestial hierarchy. —2. The name of several plants, as the dead-nettle, or Lamium; a species of Melittis; and the Galeopsis or hedge-nettle; also applied to Angelica, Archangelica.

ÄRCHANĠEL'IC, a. Belonging to archangels.

ÄRCHAPOS'TATE, n. A chief apostate.

ÄRCHAPOS'TLE, n. The chief apostle.

ÄRCHÄRCHITECT, n. The supreme architect.

ÄRCHBEACON, n. The chief beacon, place of prospect, or signal.

ÄRCHBISH'OP, n. A chief bishop; a church dignitary of the first class; a metropolitan bishop, who superintends the conduct of the suffragan bishops in his province, and also exercises episcopal authority in his own diocese.

ÄRCHBISH'OPRIC, n. [Archbishop and ric or rick, territory or jurisdiction.] The jurisdiction or place of an archbishop; the province over which an archbishop exercises authority.

ÄRCHBOTCH'ER, n. The chief botcher, or mender, ironically.

ÄRCHBUILD'ER, n Chief builder.

ÄRCHBUT'LER, n. A chief butler; an officer of the German empire, who presents the cup to the emperor, on solemn occasions. This office belongs to the king of Bohemia.

ARCHBUT'TRESS, n. In arch., a rampart arch, abutting against a wall in order to counteract the outward thrust of an interior vault or arch. It is more commonly termed flying-buttress.

ÄRCHCHAMBERLAIN, n. A chief chamberlain; an officer of the German empire, whose office was similar to that of the great chamberlain in England. This office belonged to the elector of Brandenburg.

ÄRCHCHÄNCELLOR, n. A chief chancellor; an officer in the German empire, who presided over the secretaries of the court. Under the first races of French kings, when Germany and Italy belonged to them, three archchancellors were appointed, and this institution gave rise to the three archchancellors formerly in Germany, who were the archbishops of Mentz, of Cologne, and of Treves.

ÄRCHCHÄNTER, n. The chief chanter, or president of the chanters of a church.

ÄRCHCHEM'IC, a. Of supreme chemical powers.

ÄRCHCONSPIR'ATOR, n. Principal conspirator.

ÄRCHCOUNT', n. A chief count; a title formerly given to the earl of Flanders, on account of his great riches and power.

ÄRCHCRIT'IC, n. A chief critic.

ÄRCHDAP'IFER, n. [Arch, chief, and L. dapifer, a food-bearer, from daps, meat, or a feast, and fero, to carry.] An officer in the German empire, whose office was at the coronation of the emperor, to carry the first dish of meat to table on horseback.

ÄRCHDEACON, n. [See DEACON.] In England, an ecclesiastical dignitary, next in rank below a bishop, who has jurisdiction either over a part of or over the whole diocese. He is usually appointed by the bishop, and has an authority originally derived from the bishop, but now independent of him. He has a court, the most inferior of ecclesiastical courts, for hearing ecclesiastical causes, and the punishment of offenders by spiritual censures.

ÄRCHDEACONRY, n. The office, jurisdiction, or residence of an archdeacon. In England, every diocese is divided into archdeaconries, of which there are sixty, and each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and each deanery into parishes.

ÄRCHDEACONSHIP, n. The office of an archdeacon.

ÄRCHDI'OCESE, n. The diocese of an archbishop.

ÄRCHDIVINE, n. A principal theologian.

ÄRCHDRU'ID, n. [See DRUID.] A chief druid, or pontiff of the ancient druids.

ÄRCHDU'CAL, a. [See ARCHDUKE.] Pertaining to an archduke.

ÄRCHDUCH'ESS, n. [See DUCHESS.] A title given to the females of the house of Austria.

ÄRCHDUCH'Y, n. The territory of an archduke or archduchess.

ÄRCHDÜKE, n. [See DUKE.] A title given to princes of the house of Austria; all the sons being archdukes, and the daughters archduchesses.

ÄRCHDÜKEDOM, n. The territory or jurisdiction of an archduke or archduchess.

ÄRCHED, pp. Made with an arch or curve; covered with an arch. Arched, Enarched, Archée or Archy. In her., implies that both sides of an ordinary are bowed alike, in the form of an arch. Arched double, having two arches or bends. Archée treble, or tri-archée, having three arches. Archée reversed, bowed or arched inwards.

ÄRCHEIRA, n. Long narrow loopholes in fortified walls for discharging arrows through; differing from the Arbalestina in having no cross apertures.

ÄRCHEN'EMY, n. A principal enemy.

ÄRCHER, n. [Sp. archero; It. arciero; Fr. archer; from arcus, a bow. See ARCH and ARC.] A bowman; one who uses a bow in battle; one who is skilled in the use of the bow and arrow.

ÄRCHERESS, n. A female archer.

ÄRCHERY, n. The use of the bow and arrow; the practice, art, or skill of archers; the art of shooting with a bow and arrow. This art, either as a means of offence in war, or of subsistence and amusement in time of peace, may be traced in the history of almost every nation, from the very earliest times. The Scythians among the ancients are said to have been the most expert in the practice of archery. The youth of Persia were carefully trained, in the time of Cyrus, in the use of the bow. The Parthian archers have both historic fame and poetical note. During the middle ages, no archers were equal to those of England. At Cressy, at Poictiers, the bowmen were the main strength of the English forces. Scotch archery was always inferior, despite many legislative attempts at its amelioration. In our own times, the Circassians practise archery with much effect for hostile purposes. But among us, it has become a harmless sanitary exercise. Associations for its practice are sometimes called Toxophilitic societies.

ÄRCHES COURT, or COURT OF ARCHES, is the supreme court of appeal in the archbishopric of Canterbury. It owes its name to its early sittings having been holden in the church Sanctæ Mariæ de Arcubus (St. Mary-le-Bow); but, ever since the year 1567, this court has been located in Doctors' Commons, London. It has ordinary jurisdiction in all spiritual causes arising within the parish of St Mary-le-Bow, and twelve others; these thirteen parishes forming what is called a deanery, exempt from the jurisdiction of the Bishop of London. In addition, this court has a general appellate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical causes appertaining to the province of Canterbury; it has likewise original jurisdiction on subtraction of wills which have been proved in the prerogative court of the province. Appeals from its decisions may be carried before the sovereign in council. The chief judge is the Archbishop of Canterbury; but he is usually, if not always, represented by his deputy, the Dean of the Arches, or official principal.

ÄRCHET, n. [It.] A general term denoting musical instruments played with a bow, as the violin, &c.

ÄRCH'ETYPAL, a. Original; constituting a model or pattern.

ÄRCH'ETYPE, n. [Gr. αρχετυπον; αρχη, beginning, and τυπος, form.] 1. The original pattern or model of a work; or the model from which a thing is made; as, a tree is the archetype or pattern of our idea of that tree.—2. Among minters, the standard weight by which others are adjusted.—3. Among platonists, the archetypal world is the world as it existed in the idea of God, before the creation.

ÄRCHE'US, n. [Gr. αρχη, beginning, or αρχος, a chief; W. erchi.] A term used by the ancient chemists to denote the internal efficient cause of all things; the anima mundi or plastic power of the old philosophers; the power that presides over the animal economy, or the vis medicatrix; the active principle of the material world. In med., good health, or ancient practice.

ÄRCHFEL'ON, n. [See FELON.] A chief felon.

ÄRCHFIEND, n. [See FIEND.] A chief fiend or foe.

ÄRCHFLA'MEN, n. A chief flamen or priest.

ÄRCHFLAT'TERER, n. [See FLATTERER.] A chief flatterer.

ÄRCHFOE, n. [See FOE.] A grand or chief enemy.

ÄRCHFOUND'ER, n. A chief founder.

ÄRCHGOV'ERNOR, n. The chief governor.

ÄRCHHER'ESY, n. [See HERESY.] The greatest heresy.

ÄRCHHER'ETIC, n. A chief heretic.

ÄRCHHI'EREY, n. [Gr. αρχων, chief, and ιερος, priest.] A chief priest in Russia.

ÄRCHHYP'OCRITE, n. A great or chief hypocrite.

ÄRCHI'ATER, n. [Gr. αρχος, chief, and ιατρος, physician.] Chief physician; a word used in Russia.

ÄRCH'ICAL, a. Chief; primary.

ÄRCHIDIAC'ONAL, a. [See DEACON.] Pertaining to an archdeacon; as, an archidiaconal visitation.

ÄRCHIEPISC'OPAL, a. [See EPISCOPAL.] Belonging to an archbishop; as, Canterbury is an archiepiscopal see.

ÄRCHIL, n. A lichen, (Roccella tinctoria,) which grows on rocks, in the Canary and Cape de Verd islands, which yields a rich purple colour, not durable, but very beautiful. It is bruised between stones, and moistened with strong spirit of urine mixed with quick lime. It first takes a purplish red colour, and then turns to blue. In the first state it is called archil; and in the second, lacmas or litmase, litmus. Dyers rarely use this drug by itself on account of its dearness, and the perishableness of its beauty. The chief use they make of it is for giving a bloom to other colours, as pinks, &c., but this bloom soon decays. By the addition of a little solution of tin, this drug is said to give a durable dye; but its colour is at the same time changed toward a scarlet. It is used for colouring the spirits of thermometers, and also by chemists as a test for detecting the presence of an acid.

ÄRCHILO'CHIAN, a. Pertaining to Archilochus, the poet, who invented a verse of seven feet, the first four dactyls or spondees, the last three trochees.

ÄRCHIMA'GUS, n. [See MAGICIAN.] The high priest of the Persian Magi, or worshippers of fire.

ÄRCHIMAND'RITE, n. [From mandrite, a Syriac word for monk.] In Church his., a chief of the mandrites or monks, answering to abbot in Europe.

ÄRCHIMEDE'AN, a. Pertaining to Archimedes.

ARCHIME'DES' SCREW, or WATER SCREW, named from its reputed inventor Archimedes. It is formed by winding a flexible tube round a cylinder in the form of a screw. When the screw is placed in an inclined position, as in the accompanying wood-cut, and the lower end immersed in water, by causing the screw to revolve, the water is raised to the upper end. Whatever quantity of water first enters the screw, immediately descends by its own weight to the lowest point of the spiral: but this point being always shifted higher up by the revolution of the screw, water or other fluid may thus be raised to a limited height. The principle of this screw has recently been applied with considerable success to the propelling of steam-vessels. [See SCREW.]

Archimedes' Screw.

ÄRCHING, ppr. Forming an arch; covering with an arch.

ÄRCHING, a. Curving like an arch.

ÄRCHIPEL'AGO, n. [Authors are not agreed as to the origin of this word Some suppose it to be compounded of ἀρχος, chief, and πελαγος, sea; others, of Αἰγαιος, and πελαγος, the Egean sea. See GIBBON, MITFORD, and ED. ENCYC.] In a general sense, a sea interspersed with many isles; but particularly the sea which separates Europe from Asia, otherwise called the Egean sea. It contains the Grecian isles, called Cyclades and Sporades.

ÄRCHITECT, n. [Gr. ἀρχος, chief, and τεκτων, a workman. See TECHNICAL.] 1. A person skilled in the art of building; one who understands architecture, or makes it his occupation to form plans and designs of buildings, and superintend the artificers employed.—2. A contriver; a former or maker.

ÄRCHITECT'IVE, a. Used in building; proper for building.

ÄRCHITECTON'IC, a. That has power or skill to build.

ÄRCHITECTON'ICS, n. The science of architecture.

ÄRCHITECT'RESS, n. A female architect.

ÄRCHITECT'URAL, a. Pertaining to the art of building: that is according to the rules of architecture.

ÄRCHITECTURE, n. [L. architectura.] 1. The art of building; but in a more limited and appropriate sense, the art of constructing houses, bridges, and other buildings for the purposes of civil life.—2. Frame or structure.

The earth is a piece of divine architecture. — Burnet.

Architecture is usually divided into three classes, civil, military, and naval, but when the term architecture is used without a qualifying adjective, civil architecture is always understood. Civil architecture is the art of designing and constructing palaces, houses, churches, bridges, and other edifices for the purposes of civil life; but in a more limited and appropriate sense, it is restricted to such edifices as display symmetrical disposition and fitting proportions of their parts, and are adorned by pillars, entablatures, arches, and other contrivances for their embellishment. —Military architecture is the art of fortification.—Naval architecture is the art of building ships.

AR'IMAN, } AR'IMA, } AH'RIMAN, } n. [Per. ahriman; Sans. ari, a foe.] The evil genius or demon of the Persians; opposed to yezad, yezdan, ormozd, or hormizda, the good demon. The ancient magi held, that there are two deities or principles; one the author of all good, eternally absorbed in light; the other, the author of all evil, for ever buried in darkness; or the one represented by light; the other by darkness. The latter answers to the loke of the Scandinavians, whose Celtic name loch, signifies darkness. Originally, the Persians held these demons or principles to be equal, and from all eternity; but the moderns maintain that the evil principle is an inferior being. So the devil is called the prince of darkness.

ARIOLA'TION, or HARIOLA'TION, n. [L. ariolus, or hariolus, a soothsayer.] A soothsaying; a foretelling.

ARIO'SO, a. [It. from aria, air.] Light; airy. But according to Rousseau, applied to music, it denotes a kind of melody bordering on the majestic style of a capital air.

ARISE, v. i. (s as z.) pret. arose; pp. arisen; pron. arise, arose, arizn. [Sax. arisan; Goth. reisan. It may be allied to Ar. ransa, to be the head or chief; Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. Eth. ראש, rash, head, origin.] 1. To ascend, mount up or move to a higher place; as, vapours arise from humid places.—2 To emerge from below the horizon; as, the sun or a star arises or rises. 3. To get out of bed; to leave the place or state of rest; or to leave a sitting or lying posture.

The king arose early and went to the den; Dan. vi.

ÄRM, n. [Sax. arm, earm; L. armus, an arm, a shoulder, a wing. In Russ. a shoulder is ramo, which may be the same word as the L. armus. If so, this word belongs to the root Rm. coinciding with L. ramus, a branch, that is, a shoot, like the Celtic braich, L. brachium. But if the L. armus is directly from the Gr. ἁρμος, a joint, it would seem to be formed from Gr. ἀρω, to fit.] 1. The limb of the human body, which extends from the shoulder to the hand.—2. The branch of a tree, or the slender part of a machine, projecting from a trunk or axis. The limbs of animals are also sometimes called arms. 3. A narrow inlet of water from the sea.—4. Figuratively, power, might, strength: as, the secular arm. In this sense the word is often used in the Scriptures.

To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed? Isa. liii.

In her., the arm is variously borne as a charge upon the shield and for crest.

ÄRM, v. t. [L. armo; Fr. armer; Sp. armar; It. armare; from L. arma.] 1. To furnish or equip with weapons of offence or defence; as, to arm the militia.—2. To cover with a plate, or with whatever will add strength, force, or security; as, to arm the hilt of a sword.—3. To furnish with means of defence; to prepare for resistance; to fortify.

Arm yourselves with the same mind; 1 Pet. iv.

ÄRM, v. i. To provide with arms, weapons, or means of attack or resistance: to take arms; as, the nations arm for war. This verb is not really intransitive in this use, but reciprocal, the pronoun being omitted. The nations arm for, the nations arm themselves.

ÄRMA'DA, n. [Sp. from arma.] A fleet of armed ships; a squadron. The term is usually applied to the Spanish fleet, called the Invincible Armâda, consisting of 130 ships, intended to act against England, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1588.

ÄRMADIL'LO, n. [Sp.; so called from being armed with a bony shell.] A quadruped peculiar to America, called also tatoo, and in zool., the dasypus. This animal has neither fore-teeth, nor dog-teeth; it is covered with a hard, bony shell, divided into movable belts, except on the forehead, shoulders, and haunches, where it is not movable. The belts are connected by a membrane, which enables the animal to roll itself up like a hedgehog. These animals burrow in the earth, where they lie during the day-time, seldom going abroad except at night. They are of different sizes; the largest three feet in length, without the tail. They subsist chiefly on fruits and roots; sometimes on insects and flesh. When attacked, they roll themselves into a ball, presenting their armour on all sides to any assailant; but they are inoffensive, and their flesh is esteemed good food.

Armadillo (Dasypus sexcinctus).

ÄRM'AMENT, n. [L. armamenta, utensils, tackle, from arma.] A body of forces equipped for war; used of a land or naval force. It is more generally used of a naval force, including ships, men, and all the necessary furniture for war.

ÄRMAMENT'ARY, n. An armoury; a magazine or arsenal. [Rarely used.]

ÄRM'ATURE, n [L. armatura.] 1. Armour; that which defends the body. It comprehends whatever is worn for defence of the body, and has been sometimes used for offensive weapons. Armature, like arms and armour, is used also of the furniture of animals and vegetables, evidently intended for their protection; as, prickles, spines, and horns.—2. In ancient military art, an exercise performed with missive weapons, as darts, spears, and arrows.—Armature of a magnet, two pieces of soft iron, applied to the poles of a natural magnet, and fastened upon the stone by means of a brass or silver box. A third piece of iron applied to the ends of these, serves to connect both poles of the magnet and enables it to sustain a greater weight. A natural magnet thus prepared, is said to be armed. Artificial magnets are likewise armed in a similar manner.

ÄRM-CHAIR, n. A chair with arms.

ÄRM'ED, pp. Furnished with weapons of offence or defence; furnished with the means of security; fortified, in a moral sense.—2. In her., armed is when the beaks, talons, horns, or teeth of beasts and birds of prey are of a different colour from the rest of the body.—3. Capped and cased, as the loadstone; that is, set in iron. An armed ship is one which is taken into the service of government for a particular occasion, and armed like a ship of war. Double-headed shot is said to be armed when rope yarn, or the like, is rolled about the end of the iron bar which runs through the shot.—Armed at all points, a term used for a man completely covered with armour excepting his face.

—Armé en flute, when a ship of the line is armed en flute, her lower-deck guns are removed, and even a portion of those on her upper deck. This is chiefly practised with inferior vessels.

ÄRM'ED, a. In bot., having prickles or thorns.

ÄRMED-CHAIR, n A chair with arms to support the elbows

ÄRMED NEUTRALITY. A confederacy of the Northern powers against Britain, commenced in 1780 by the Empress of Russia. Its principle was, that a neutral flag covered neutral goods though destined for the service of the enemy. The objects of this confederacy were finally defeated in 1801 by the bombarding of Copenhagen and the destruction of the Danish fleet.

ÄRME'NIAN, a. Pertaining to Armenia; a country, and formerly a kingdom in Asia, divided into Major and Minor. The greater Armenia is now called Turcomania.

ÄRME'NIAN, n. A native of Armenia, or the language of the country. Armenian bole is a species of clay from Armenia, and found in other countries. But the term, being of uncertain signification, is rejected in modern mineralogy. [See BOLE.]—Armenian stone, a soft blue stone, consisting of calcareous earth or gypsum, with the oxide of copper. It is too soft to give fire with steel, loses its colour when heated, and does not admit of a polish.

ÄRM'IGER, n. [L. One that bears arms.] A knight or esquire, a knight's companion.

ÄRMIG'EROUS, a. [L armiger; arma and gero.] Literally, bearing arms. But in present usage, armiger is a title of dignity next in degree to a knight. In times of chivalry, it signified an attendant on a knight, or other person of rank, who bore his shield and rendered him other military services. So in antiq., Abimelech, Saul, &c. had their armour-bearers; Judg. ix.; 1 Sam xvi. As had Hector and Achilles. This title, under the French princes, in England, was exchanged, in common usage, for esquire, Fr. ecuyer, a word of similar import, from ecu, L. scutum, a shield. Armiger is still retained with us, as a title of respect, being the Latin word equivalent to esquire, which see.

ÄRMIL'LA, n. [Lat.] A bracelet, or ornament for the wrist. In mechanics, an iron ring, hoop, or brace, in which the gudgeons of a wheel move. In anat., a circular ligament, comprehending the manifold tendons of the whole hand, as it were in a circle in the region of the carpus.

ÄRM'ILLARY, a. [L. armilla, a bracelet, from armus, the arm.] Resembling a bracelet, or ring; consisting of rings or circles. It is chiefly applied to an artificial sphere, composed of a number of circles of the mundane sphere, put together in their natural order, to assist in giving a just conception of the constitution of the heavens, and the motions of the celestial bodies. This artificial sphere revolves upon its axis within a horizon, divided into degrees, and movable every way upon a brass supporter.

Armillary sphere.

ÄRM'ILLATED, a. Furnished with bracelets.

ÄRM'LESS, a. Without an arm; destitute of weapons.

ÄRM'LET, n. [dim. of arm.] A little arm; a piece of armour for the arm; a bracelet. Though armlet and bracelet are frequently employed as convertible terms, yet the armlet worn on the upper arm should be distinguished from Persian. Egyptian.

Armlets

the bracelet, which is an ornament worn on the wrist. In the East another feature distinguishes the one from the other, the latter being worn exclusively by women, and the former only by men, with whom it is regarded as one of the insignia of sovereign power The most famous existing armlets are those which form part of the Persian regalia, and which formerly belonged to the Moguls.

ÄRM'OUR, n. [from arm.] 1. Defensive arms; any habit worn to protect the body in battle; formerly called harness. A complete suit of armour formerly consisted of a casque or helmet, a gorget, cuirass, gauntlets, tasses, brassets, cuishes, and covers for the legs to which the spurs were fastened. In English statutes, armour is used for the whole apparatus of war; including offensive as well as defensive arms. The statutes of armour, 27 Hen II, and of Westminster, directed what arms every man should provide. Hence armour includes all instruments of war.—2. In a spiritual sense, a good conscience, faith and Christian graces are called armour; Rom. xiii.; Eph. vi.; 2 Cor. vi. Coat armour is the escutcheon of a person or family, with its several charges and other furniture, as mantling, crest, supporters, motto, &c.

ARRACA'CHA, n. A genus of umbelliferous plants, which comprehends a species of much importance in the tropical parts of America, as the parsnip and carrot are in Europe. The root is of the same nature as the tuber of a potatoe, only it is divided into several lobes, each of which is about the size of a large carrot. These are boiled like potatoes, and form a staple nutriment in the South American provinces.

AR'RACH, n. A plant. [See ORRACH.]

ARRACK', n. Contracted into rack. A spirituous liquor from the East Indies. The name is said to signify, in the East, any spirituous liquor; but that which usually bears this name is toddy, a liquor distilled from the juice of the cocoa-nut tree, procured by incision.

AR'RAGONITE, n. [From Molina in Arragon, Spain.] In mineral., a species of carbonate of lime, but not pure, and said to contain 3 or 4 per cent. of carbonate of strontian. It differs from pure carbonate of lime, in hardness, specific gravity, crystalline structure, &c. It is harder than calcareous spar, and exhibits several varieties of structure and form. It is often crystallized, generally in hexahedral prisms or pyramids. The massive varieties have usually a fibrous structure, exhibiting various imitative forms, being sometimes coraloidal.

ARRĀIGN, v. t. (arra'ne.) [Norm. arraner, arraisoner, and aresner, to put to answer, to arraign. The usual derivation of this word, from Sax. wregan, gewregan, to accuse, is probably incorrect. It appears to be of Norman origin, and if s is radical, it coincides in origin with L. reus, contracted from the root of res.] 1. To call or set a prisoner at the bar of a court, to answer to the matter charged against him in an indictment, or information. When called, the indictment is read to him, and he is put to plead, guilty or not guilty, and to elect by whom he will be tried. This term is unknown in the law of Scotland, except in trials for high treason, in which the forms of procedure in both countries are the same.—2. According to law writers, to set in order; to fit for trial; as, to arraign a writ of novel disseisin. To arraign the assize, is to cause the tenant to be called to make the plaint, and set the cause in order, that the tenant may be brought to answer.—3. To accuse; to charge with faults. More correctly, to call before the bar of reason, or taste; to call in question, for faults, before any tribunal.

They will not arraign you for want of knowledge. Dryden.

ARRĀIGN, n. (arra'ne.) Arraignment; as, clerk of the arraigns.

ARRĀIGNED, pp. Called before a tribunal to answer, and elect triers; accused; called in question.

ARRĀIGN'ER, n. One who arraigns.

ARRĀIGNING, ppr. Calling before a court or tribunal; accusing.

ARRĀIGNMENT, n. [Norm. arresnement, arraynement.] 1. The act of arraigning; the act of calling and setting a prisoner before a court to answer to an accusation, and to choose his triers.—2. Accusation.—3. A calling in question for faults.

4. To hinder, or restrain; as, to arrest the course of justice.

ARREST', n. The taking or apprehending of a person by virtue of a warrant from authority. An arrest is made by seizing or touching the body. In civil cases, a person is laid under arrest for the purpose of securing a debt to an individual; and in criminal or penal cases, the arrest is made, for the purpose of compelling the person charged with a crime, or offence, to appear and submit to justice. In all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, the arrest must take place by the lawful warrant of some court of record, or officer of justice. Ambassadors, and their domestic servants, officers of courts of justice, witnesses, and all other persons necessarily attending any court of record upon business, members of the legislature, peers, and bishops, are privileged from arrest.—2 Any seizure, or taking by power, physical or moral.—3. A stop, hinderance, or restraint.—4. In law, an arrest of judgment is the staying or stopping of a judgment after verdict, for causes assigned. Courts have power to arrest judgment for intrinsic causes appearing upon the face of the record; as when the declaration varies from the original writ; when the verdict differs materially from the pleadings; or when the case laid in the declaration is not sufficient in point of law, to found an action upon. The motion for this purpose is called a motion in arrest of judgment.—5. A mangy humour between the ham and pastern of the hind legs of a horse.

ARRESTA'TION, n. The act of arresting; an arrest, or seizure.

ARREST'ED, pp. Seized; apprehended; stopped; hindered; restrained.

ÄR'SENATE, } n. A salt, formed by
ARSE'NIATE, } arsenic acid combined with any base.

ÄRSENIC, n. [Ar. zirnakon: Syr. zarnika; Gr. ἀρσενικον: L. arsenicum; Fr. arsenic.] Arsenic, as it is usually seen in the shops, is not a metal, but an acid from which the metal may be easily obtained by mixing it with half its weight of black flux, and introducing the mixture into a Florence flask, gradually raised to a red heat, in a sand bath. A brilliant metallic sublimate of pure arsenic collects in the upper part of the flask. Arsenic is of a steel blue colour, quite brittle. It forms alloys with most of the metals. Combined with sulphur it forms orpiment or realgar, which are the yellow and red sulphurets of arsenic. Orpiment is the true arsenicum of the ancients, Plin. 34, 18. Native orpiment appears in yellow, brilliant, and seemingly talcky masses of various sizes; realgar is red, of different shades, and often crystallized in needles. Arsenic is also found as a mineralizer in cobalt, antimony, copper, iron, and silver ores. It is brought chiefly from the cobalt works in Saxony, where zaffer is made. Of all substances arsenic is that which has most frequently occasioned death by poisoning, both by accident and design. One of the best precipitant tests of this deadly poison is nitrate of silver, and the best remedies against its effects on the stomach are copious draughts of bland liquids of a mucilaginous consistence, which serve to procure its complete ejection from the stomach. Like many other virulent poisons, it is a safe and useful medicine when judiciously employed. It is used as a flux for glass, and also for forming pigments.

ÄRSENIC ACID, n. Arsenic combined with a greater proportion of oxygen, than in the arsenous acid.

ÄRSEN'ICAL, a. Belonging to arsenic; consisting of or containing arsenic.

ÄRSEN'ICATE, v. t. To combine with arsenic.

ÄRSHINE, n. A Russian measure of two feet, four inches, and 242 decimals. This seems to be the Chinese arschin, of which four make three yards English.

ÄR'SIS, n. [Gr. ἀρσις, from αἰρω, to elevate.] In grammar, the elevation of the voice in distinction from thesis, or the depression of the voice. Arsis and Thesis in music, is applied to the rising and falling of the hand in beating time.

ÄRSON, n. [Norm. Fr. arsine, arsum; from L. ardeo, arsum, to burn.] In law, the malicious burning of a dwelling house or out house of another man, which by the common law is felony. The definition of this crime is varied by statutes in different countries and states. In Connecticut, the burning not only of a dwelling house or contiguous building, but of a ship or other vessel, is declared to be arson, if human life is thereby destroyed or put to hazard.

ÄRT. The second person indicative mood, present tense, of the substantive and auxiliary verb to be.—Present tense, I am, thou art, he is, &c.

ÄRT, n. [L. ars, artis; probably contracted from the root of W. cerz, Ir. ceard. The radical sense is strength from stretching, straining, the primary sense of strength and power, and hence of skill. See an analogy in can.] 1. The disposition or modification of things by human skill, to answer the purpose intended. In this sense art stands opposed to nature.—2. A system of rules, serving to facilitate the performance of certain actions; opposed to science, or to speculative principles; as, the art of building or engraving. Arts are divided into useful or mechanic, and liberal or polite. The mechanic arts are those in which the hands and body are more concerned than the mind; as, in making clothes, and utensils. These arts are called trades.—2. The liberal or polite arts; or as they are now more frequently termed, the fine arts, are generally understood to comprehend those productions of human genius and skill which are more or less addressed to the sentiment of taste or to the imagination; as painting, sculpture, architecture, engraving, drawing, and music.

In America, literature and the elegant arts must grow up side by side with the coarser plants of daily necessity. Irving.

3. Skill, dexterity, or the power of performing certain actions acquired by experience, study, or observation.—4. Trade.

This observation is afforded us by the art of making sugar. Boyle.

5. Artfulness; cunning.

More matter with less art. Shak.

Arts and sciences may be distinguished thus: science is knowledge; art is power or skill in the use of knowledge; the art is the practical use of the science, that is, of the principles of the science. Art and part, in the law of Scotland, the aiding or abetting in the perpetration of a crime.

ÄRTEMIS'IA, n. Mug-wort, southernwood, and wormwood; a genus of plants of numerous species, belonging to the nat. order Compositæ, or compound flowered plants. Of these, the Absinthium or common wormwood, is well known. Several of the species are used as remedies for worms.

ÄRTE'RIAL, a. [See ARTERY.] Pertaining to an artery or the arteries; as, arterial action.—2. Contained in an artery; as, arterial blood.

ÄRTERIALIZ'ATION, n. The process of making arterial.

ÄRTE'RIALIZE, v. t. To communicate, as to venous blood, the qualities of arterial blood.

ÄRTE'RIALIZED, a. Made arterial.

ÄRTE'RIALIZING, ppr. Rendering arterial.

ÄRTERIOL'OGY, n. [Gr. ἀρτηρια, artery, and λογος, discourse.] A treatise or discourse on the arteries.

ÄRTERIOT'OMY, n. [Gr. ἀρτηρια, an artery, and τομη, a cutting.] The opening of an artery by the lancet, for the purpose of letting blood. The temporal artery is usually opened in such cases.

ÄR'TERY, n. [Gr. ἀρτηρια, from ἀηρ, air, and τηρεω, to preserve or contain; so called, from the opinion of the ancients, that the arteries contain or circulate air. The term was also applied to the trachea or wind-pipe, arteria aspera. In Ger. luft-ader, air-vein, is the name for artery; in Dutch, slag-ader, stroke vein; in Swed. puls ader, pulse-vein; Dan. puls-aare, pulse-vein; that is, the beating vein.]. A cylindrical vessel or tube, which conveys the blood from the heart to all parts of the body. There are two principal arteries; the aorta, which rises from the left ventricle and ramifies through the whole body; and the pulmonary artery, which conveys the blood from the right ventricle to the lungs, to undergo respiration. An artery is composed of three coats; the outer consists of condensed cellular membrane, and is supplied with numerous blood-vessels and nerves; the middle coat consists of circular fibres, generally supposed to be muscular; the inner coat, thin, smooth, and dense, confines the blood within its canal, and facilitates its motion.

ÄRTES'IAN WELLS, n. Perpendicular perforations or borings into the ground through which water rises from various depths according to circumstances, above the surface of the soil, producing a constant flow or stream. They have received their name from the opinion that they were first used in the district of Artois in France.

ÄRT'FUL, n. [See ART.] Performed with art or skill.—2. Artificial, as opposed to natural.—3. Cunning; practising art, or stratagem; crafty; as, an artful boy. [This is the most usual sense.]

ÄRTHRI'TIS, n. [Gr. αρθριτις, from αρθρον, a joint.] In a general sense, any painful disease of the joints; but more particularly the gout, an hereditary, intermitting disease, usually affecting the small joints; sometimes the stomach; any inflammation of the joints.

ÄRTHRO'DIA, n. [Gr. from αρθροω, to frame or articulate.] 1. A species of articulation, in which the head of one bone is received into the shallow socket of another; as the humerus and the scapula.—2. In nat. hist., a genus of imperfect crystals, found in complex masses, and forming long single pyramids, with very short and slender columns.

ÄRTHRODYN'IC, n. [Gr. αρθρον, a joint, and οδυνη, pain.] A rheumatic or other painful affection of the joints.

ÄRTHRO'SIS, n. [Gr. αρθρον, a joint.] In anat., articulation.

ÄR'TIC. This word is by mistake used by some authors for arctic.

ÄR'TICHOKE, n. [Qu. the first syllable of Gr. αρτυτικα, Fr. artichaut; It. carciofo, carciofano, or carciofalo. The first syllable is probably the L. carduus, chard, thistle, corrupted. D. artichok; G. artischoke; Dan. artiskok.] The Cynara Scolymus, a plant belonging to the nat. order Compositæ, somewhat resembling a thistle, with a dilated, imbricated and prickly calyx. The head is large, rough and scaly, on an upright stalk. It is composed of numerous, oval scales, inclosing the florets, sitting on a broad receptacle, which, with the fleshy base of the scales, is the eatable part of the plant. The Jerusalem artichoke is a species of sunflower or helianthus.

ÄR'TICLE, n. [L. articulus, a joint, from artus; Gr. αρθρον.] 1. A single clause in a contract, account, system of regulations, treaty, or other writing; a particular separate charge or item, in an account; a term, condition, or stipulation in a contract. In short, a distinct part of a writing, instrument or discourse, consisting of two or more particulars; as, articles of agreement; an account consisting of many articles. 2. A point of faith; a doctrinal point or proposition in theology; as the thirty-nine articles.—3. A distinct part.

Upon each article of human duty. Paley.

4. A particular commodity, or substance; as, an article of merchandise; salt is a necessary article. In common usage, this word is applied to almost every separate substance or material.

The articles which compose the blood. Darwin.

5.† A point of time.—6. In bot., that part of a stalk or stem, which is between two joints.—7. In grammar, an adjective used before nouns, to limit or define their application; as hic, ille, ipse, in Latin; ὁ, ἡ, το, in Greek; the, this, that, in English; le, la, les, in French; il, la, lo, in Italian. The primary use of these adjectives was to convert an indeterminate name into a determinate one; or to limit the application of a common name to a specific, known, or certain individual. But article being an improper term to express the true signification, I make use of definitive, which see.

ÄR'TICLE, v. t. To draw up in distinct particulars; as, to article the errors or follies of man.—2. To accuse or charge by an exhibition of articles. "He shall be articled against in the high court of admiralty;" Stat. 33, Geo. III.—3 To bind by articles of covenant or stipulation; as, to article an apprentice to a mechanic.

ÄR'TICLE, v. i. [supra.] To agree by articles; to stipulate.

ÄR'TICLED, pp. Drawn up in particulars; accused or bound by articles.

ÄRTIC'ULAR, a. [L. articularis.] Belonging to the joints; as, the gout is an articular disease.

ÄRTIC'ULARLY, adv. So as to sound every letter.

ÄRTICULA'TA, or ÄRTIC'ULA'TED ANIMALS, n. plur. The third great section of the animal kingdom according to the arrangement of Cuvier. They are so called, because the different portions of their body are composed of moveable pieces articulated to each other. They are divided into four classes; viz. Annelidæ, Crustacea, Arachnida, and Insecta. See these terms.

ÄRTIC'ULATE, a. [L. articulatus, jointed, distinct.] Formed by jointing or articulation of the organs of speech; applied to sound. An articulate sound is made by closing and opening the organs of speech. The junction or closing of the organs forms a joint or articulation, as in the syllables ab, ad, ap; in passing from one articulation to another, the organs are, or may be opened, and a vowel is uttered, as in attune; and the different articulations, with the intervening vocal sounds, form what is called articulate sounds; sounds distinct, separate, and modified by articulation or jointing. This articulation constitutes the prominent difference between the human voice and that of brutes. Brutes open the mouth and make vocal sounds, but have, either not at all, or very imperfectly, the power of articulation.—2.† Expressed in articles, or in separate particulars.—3. Jointed; formed with joints.—Articulate adjudication. In Scots law, an adjudication which is often used where there are more debts than one due to the adjudging creditor; in which case it is usual to accumulate each debt by itself, so that, in case of an error in ascertaining or calculating one of the debts, the error may only affect that debt.

ÄRTIC'ULATE, v. t. To utter articulate sounds; to utter distinct syllables or words.—2.† To draw up or write in separate particulars.—3.† To treat, stipulate or make terms.—4. To joint.

ÄRTIC'ULATED, pp. Uttered distinctly in syllables or words.—2. Jointed; having joints, as a plant or animal.

ÄRTIC'ULATELY, adv. With distinct utterance of syllables or words.—2. Article by article; in detail.

ÄRTIC'ULATENESS, n. The quality of being articulate.

ÄRTIC'ULATING, ppr. Uttering in distinct syllables or words

ÄRTICULA'TION, n. In anat., the joining or juncture of the bones. This is of three kinds: 1st, diarthrosis, or a moveable connection, including enarthrosis, or the ball and socket joint; arthrodia, which is the same, but more superficial; ginglymus, or hinge-like joint; and trochoid, or the wheel and axle: 2nd, synarthrosis, immoveable connection, as by suture, or junction by serrated margins; harmony, or union by straight margins; and gomphosis, like a nail driven in a board, as the teeth in their sockets: 3rd, symphysis, or union by means of another substance; as, synchondrosis, union by a cartilage; syssarcosis, union by muscular fibres; syneurosis, union by a tendon; syndesmosis, union by ligaments; and synostosis, union by a bony substance.—2. In bot., the connection of the parts of a plant by joints; also the nodes or joints, as in cane and maize.—3. The forming of words; a distinct utterance of syllables and words by the human voice, by means of closing and opening the organs.—4. A consonant; a letter noting a jointing or closing of the organs.—5. In painting and sculpture, the moveable connection of the bones, in the representation of which by the artist, the greatest skill and knowledge of anatomy is required.

Articulated root, and stem.

ÄRT'IFICE, n. [L. artificium, from ars, art, and facio, to make.] 1. Artful contrivance; an artful or ingenious device, in a good or bad sense. In a bad sense, it corresponds with trick, or fraud.—2.† Art; trade; skill acquired by science or practice.

ÄRTIF'ICER, n. [L. artifex, from ars, and facio.] 1. An artist; a mechanic or manufacturer; one whose occupation requires skill or knowledge of a particular kind; as, a silversmith or saddler.—2. One who makes or contrives; an inventor; as, an artificer of fraud or lies.—3.† A cunning or artful fellow.

ÄRTIFI''CIAL, a. Made or contrived by art, or by human skill and labour, in opposition to natural; as, artificial heat or light; an artificial magnet.—2. Feigned; fictitious; not genuine or natural; as, artificial tears.—3. Contrived with skill or art.—4. Cultivated; not indigenous; not being of spontaneous growth; as, artificial grasses. Artificial arguments, in rhet., are arguments invented by the speaker, in distinction from laws, authorities, and the like, which are called inartificial arguments or proofs. Artificial lines, on a sector or scale, are lines so contrived as to represent the logarithmic sines and tangents, which, by the help of the line of numbers, solve, with tolerable exactness, questions in trigonometry, navigation, &c. Artificial numbers, the same with logarithms.

ÄRTIFICIAL'ITY, n. The quality of being artificial; appearance of art.

ÄRTIFI''CIALLY, adv. By art or human skill and contrivance; hence, with good contrivance; with art or ingenuity.

ÄRTIFI''CIALNESS, n. The quality of being artificial.

ÄRTIL'LERIST, n. A person skilled in gunnery.

ÄRTIL'LERY, n. This word has no plural. [Fr. artillerie. In Fr. artilleur, artillier, is a gunner; Sp. artillar, to mount cannon. In Armoric, artillery is artilhiry, and an artist is artilher. In Norm. Fr. artillery is written articlarie. The Armoric unites this word with art, artist, indicating that the primary sense is, instruments, things formed by art, or rather prepared by art, preparations.] 1. In a general sense, offensive weapons of war. Hence, it was formerly used for bows and arrows.

And Jonathan gave his artillery to his lad; 1 Sam. xx.

But in present usage, appropriately,- 2. Cannon; great guns; ordnance, including guns, mortars, and grenades, with their furniture of carriages, balls, bombs, and shot of all kinds.—3. In a more extended sense, the word includes powder, cartridges, matches, utensils, machines of all kinds, and horses that belong to a train of artillery.—4. The men who manage cannon and mortars, including matrosses, gunners, bombardiers, cannoniers, or by whatever name they are called, with the officers, engineers, and persons who supply the artillery with implements and materials. Park of artillery, that place in a camp which is set apart for the depot of guns, ammunition, and stores, to be in readiness, as occasion may require. Train of artillery, a number of pieces of ordnance, mounted on carriages, with all their furniture, fit for marching.

ÄRTIL'LERY-MAN, n. A man who manages a large gun in firing.

ÄRTISAN, n. (s as z.) [Fr. from ars. See ART.] An artist; one skilled in any art, mystery, or trade; a handicraftsman; a mechanic; a tradesman.

ÄRTIST, n. [Fr. artiste; It. artista; from L. ars. See ART.] 1. One skilled in an art, or trade; one who is master or professor of a manual art; a good workman in any trade.—2. A skilful man; not a novice. 3 In an academical sense, a proficient in the faculty of arts; a philosopher.- 4. One skilled in the fine arts; as a painter, sculptor, architect, &c.

ÄRTLESS, a. Unskilful; wanting art, knowledge, or skill.—2. Free from guile, art, craft, or stratagem; simple, sincere; unaffected; undesigning; as, an artless mind.—3. Contrived without skill or art; as, an artless tale.

ÄRTLESSLY, adv. Without art or skill; in an artless manner.—2. Without guile; naturally; sincerely; unaffectedly.

ÄRTLESSNESS, n. The quality of being void of art or guile; simplicity; sincerity; unaffectedness.

ÄRTOCARP'EÆ, n. [Gr. ἄρτος, bread, and καρπος, fruit.] The bread-fruit tribe, a natural order of plants, nearly related to the nettle tribe. Artocarpus, or the bread-fruit, is the genus which gives its name to the above order.—It consists of trees, having stems of very considerable size, and large leaves, which are exceedingly rough, with little points. The bread-fruit tree is about the size of a small oak, and a native of the South Sea islands. The fruit, which is contained in a catkin, varies in size from that of a child's to that of a man's head, and forms a substitute for bread in the countries in which it grows. There are two species of Artocarpeæ, A. incisa, or true bread-fruit tree, and A. integrifolia, or jack-fruit.

ÄR'TOTYRITE, n. [of Gr. ἄρτος, bread, and τυρος, cheese.] One of a sect of heretics, in the primitive church, who celebrated the eucharist with bread and cheese, alleging that the first oblations of men were not only the fruit of the earth, but of their flocks. They admitted females to the priesthood and episcopacy.

ÄRTS-MAN,† n. A learned man.

ARUM, n. [Gr. ἄρον.] A genus of plants, belonging to the class Monoecia, and order Polyandria, and to the nat. order Aroideæ, or Araceæ. Arum maculatum, the common wake-robin, is found in many woods in Britain. It has acrid properties. Its underground stem yields, however, a quantity of starchy matter, which is known by the name of Portland sago. All the species of this genus develope much heat during flowering.

ARUNDEL'IAN, a. Pertaining to Arundel; as, Arundelian marbles. The Arundelian marbles are ancient stones, containing a chronological detail of the principal events of Greece, from Cecrops, who lived about 1582 years before Christ, to the archonship of Diognetus, before Christ 264. The engraving was done in Paros, and the chronology is called the Parian Chronicle. These stones are called Arundelian, from the Earl of Arundel, who employed William Petty to procure relics of antiquity in the East, in 1624. These, with other curiosities, were purchased, and by the Earl's grandson presented to the University of Oxford. Their antiquity, and even their authenticity, has been questioned.

ARUNDINA'CEOUS, a. [L. arundo, a reed.] Pertaining to a reed; resembling the reed or cane.

ARUNDIN'EOUS, or ARUN'DINOSE, a. Abounding with reeds.

ARUN'DO, n. [Lat.] A reed; a genus of plants of the class Triandria, and order Digynia, and nat. order Gramineæ. To it belongs the common reed of our marshes called A. Phragmites.

ARU'RA, n. [Gr. ἄρουρα.] Literally, as authors suppose, a ploughed field. According to Herodotus and Suidas, the arura of Egypt was a piece of ground fifty feet square. Others make it a square of 100 cubits; others of 100 feet. The Grecian aroura was a square measure of half the plethron. [See AROURA.]

ARUS'PEX, n. [L.] A soothsayer.

ARUS'PICE, n. written also Haruspice. [L. aruspex, or haruspex, a soothsayer, or diviner, who attempted to foretell events by consulting the entrails of beasts slain in sacrifice. Qu. Teut. orf, yrf; Eth. arwe, cattle, and L. specio, to view.] A priest in ancient Rome, whose business was to inspect the entrails of victims, killed in sacrifice, and by them to foretell future events.

ARUS'PICY, n. The act of prognosticating by inspection of the entrails of beasts slain in sacrifice.

ÄRVEL, n. A funeral.

ARYTÆ'NOID, a. [Gr. ἀρυταινα, a funnel, and εἶδος, shape.] Funnel-shaped. In anat., applied to two small cartilages at the top of the larynx, and also to the muscles, glands, &c., connected with these cartilages.

AS, adv. (az.) [Pers. asa, like, similar, as; Gr. ὡς: Qu. Fr. aussi. But more probably the English word is contracted from als, G. and D. It corresponds in sense with the Persian.] 1. Literally, like; even; similar. "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." "As far as we can see," that is, like far, equally far. Hence it may be explained by in like manner; as, do as you are commanded.—2.† It was formerly used where we now use that.

The relations are so uncertain as they require a great deal of examination. Bacon

3.† It was formerly used for as if

He lies, as he his bliss did know. Waller

4. While; during; at the same time. "He trembled as he spoke." But in most of its uses, it is resolvable into like, equal, even, or equally, in like manner. In some phrases, it must be considered a nominative word, or other words must be supplied. "Appoint to office such men as deserve public confidence." This phrase may be elliptical for "such men as those who deserve public confidence." As seems in some cases, to imply the sense of proportion. "In general, men are more happy, as they are less involved in public concerns." As, in a subsequent part of a sentence, answers to such; give us such things as you please; and in a preceding part of a sentence, has so to answer to it; as with the people, so with the priest.

AS, n. [L.] A Roman weight of 12 ounces, answering to the libra or pound.—2. A Roman coin, originally of a pound weight; but reduced, after the first Punic war, to two ounces; in the second Punic war, to one ounce; and by the Papirian law, to half an ounce. It was originally stamped with the figure of a sheep, sow, or ox; and afterward with a Janus, on one side, and on the reverse, a rostrum or prow of a ship. —3. An integer; a whole or single thing. Hence the English ace. Hence the Romans used the word for the whole inheritance; hæres ex asse, an heir to the whole estate

AS'A, a corruption of lasar, an ancient name of a gum. [See OOZE.]

ASADUL'CIS, the same as benzoin.

ASAFET'IDA, } n. [Asa, gum, and L.
ASAFŒT'IDA, } fœtidus, fetid.] A fetid inspissated sap, from the East Indies. It is the concrete juice of the Ferula asafetida, a large umbelliferous plant, found near Herat, on the confines of Persia; and is much used in medicine, as an antispasmodic.

ASARABAC'CA, n. A plant belonging to the class Dodecandria, and order Monogynia, nat. order Aristolochiaceæ and botanically called Asarum Europæum. Its leaves are acrid, bitter, and nauseous, and its root is extremely acrid. Both the leaves and root were formerly used as an emetic, but are now disused. It enters into the composition of medicated snuffs, which are recommended in cases of headache.

AS'ARINE, n. A substance obtained by distilling the root of Asarum Europæum with water. It is a crystallized solid, with an aromatic taste and smell like those of camphor.

ASARUM. See ASARABACCA.

ASBES'TINE, a. [See ASBESTUS.] Pertaining to asbestus, or partaking of its nature and qualities; incombustible.

ASBES'TINITE, n. [See ASBESTUS.] The actinolite or strahlstein. Calciferous asbestinite; a variety of steatite.

ASBES'TOID, n. A mineral thus called, from its resemblance to asbestos.

ASBES'TUS, } n. [Gr. ἄσβεστος, inextin-ASBES'TOS, } guishable; of α neg. and σβεννυμι, to extinguish.] A mineral which has frequently the appearance of a vegetable substance. It is always fibrous, and its fibres sometimes appear to be prismatic crystals. They are sometimes delicate, flexible, and elastic: at other times, stiff and brittle. Its powder is soft to the touch; its colours are some shade of white, gray, or green, passing into brown, red, or black. It is incombustible, and has been wrought into a soft, flexible cloth, which was formerly used as a shroud for dead bodies. It has been also manufactured into incombustible paper, and wicks for lamps. Ligniform asbestus, is a variety of a brown colour, of a splintery fracture, and if broken across, presents an irregular filamentous structure, like wood.

AS'BOLIN, n. [Gr. ασβολη, soot.] An oil-like matter, acrid, and bitter, obtained from soot.

AS'CARIS, n. plur. (Ascar'ides.) [Gr.] In zool., a genus of intestinal worms. The body is cylindrical, and tapering at the ends.

ASCEND', v. i. [L. ascendo, from scando, to mount or climb; W. esgyn, to rise; cyn, first, chief. It has the same elements as begin.] 1. To move upwards; to mount; to go up; to rise, whether in air or water, or upon a material object.—2. To rise, in a figurative sense; to proceed from an inferior to a superior degree, from mean to noble objects, from particulars to generals, &c.—3. To proceed from modern to ancient times; to recur to former ages: as, our inquiries ascend to the remotest antiquity.—4. In a corresponding sense, to proceed in a line towards ancestors; as, to ascend to our first progenitors.—5. To rise as a star: to proceed or come above the horizon.—6. In music, to rise in vocal utterance; to pass from any note to one more acute.

ASCEND', v. t. To go or move upwards upon, as to ascend a hill or ladder; or to climb, as to ascend a tree.

ASCEND'ABLE, a. That may be ascended.

ASCEND'ANT, n. Superiority or commanding influence; as, one man has the ascendant over another.—2. An ancestor, or one who precedes in genealogy, or degrees of kindred; opposed to descendant.—3. Height; elevation. [Little us.] 4. In astrol., that degree of the ecliptic which rises above the horizon at the time of one's birth. That part of the ecliptic at any particular time above the horizon, supposed to have influence on a person's life and fortune.

ASCEND'ANT, a. Superior; predominant; surpassing.—2. In astrol., above the horizon.

ASCEND'ED, pp. or a. Risen; mounted up; gone to heaven.

ASCEND'ENCY, n. Power; governing or controlling influence.

Custom has an ascendency over the understanding. Watts.

ASCEND'ING, ppr. Rising; moving upwards; proceeding from the less to the greater; proceeding from modern to ancient, from grave to more acute. A star is said to be ascending, when rising above the horizon, in any parallel of the equator. Ascending latitude, is the latitude of a planet when moving toward the north pole. Ascending node, is that point of a planet's orbit, wherein it passes the ecliptic to proceed northward. It is also called the northern node. Ascending signs, the signs Capricornus, Aquarius, Pisces, Aries, Taurus, and Gemini, are so called, because the sun, while in them, is approaching the north celestial pole, which is elevated to us. Ascending vessels, in anat., are those which carry the blood upward, or toward the superior parts of the body.

ASCEN'SION, n. [L. ascensio.] 1. The act of ascending; a rising. It is frequently applied to the visible elevation of our Saviour to heaven.—2. The thing rising or ascending. [Not authorized.]—3. In astr., ascension is either right or oblique. Right ascension of the sun, or of a star, is that degree of the equinoctial, counted from the beginning of Aries, which rises with the sun or star, in a right sphere. Oblique ascension, is an arch of the equator intercepted between the first point of Aries, and that point of the equator which rises together with a star, in an oblique sphere. The terms oblique ascension, and ascensional difference, (see below) are nearly out of use, while the term right ascension, is applied in a sense somewhat different from that in which it was formerly used. The right ascension of a heavenly body is now employed, to signify an arch of the equator intercepted between the point Aries, and the declination circle which passes through the body. It is reckoned according to the order of the signs, and is often expressed in hours, minutes, and seconds, instead of degrees, minutes, and seconds.

ASCENSION-DAY, n. A festival of some Christian churches, held ten days or on the Thursday but one, before Whitsuntide, which is called holy Thursday, in commemoration of our Saviour's ascension into heaven, after his resurrection. Ascensional difference, is the difference between the right and oblique ascension of the same point on the surface of the sphere.

ASCEN'SIVE, a. Rising; tending to rise, or causing to rise.

ASCENT', n. [L. ascensus.] 1. The act of rising; motion upwards, whether in air, water, or other fluid, or on elevated objects; rise; a mounting upward; as, the ascent of vapours from the earth. Ascent of liquids, the rising of liquids above the level of their own surface, in capillary tubes.—2. The way by which one ascends; the means of ascending.—3. An eminence, hill, or high place. 4. The degree of elevation of an object, or the angle it makes with a horizontal line; as, a road has an ascent of five degrees.—5. Acclivity; the rise of a hill; as a steep ascent.

ASCERTAIN, v. t. [From the L. ad certum, to a certainty.] 1. To make certain; to define or reduce to precision, by removing obscurity or ambiguity.

The divine law ascertains the truth. Hooker.

2 To make certain, by trial, examination, or experiment, so as to know what was before unknown; as, to ascertain the weight of a commodity, or the purity of a metal.—3. To make sure by previous measures.

The ministry in order to ascertain a majority in the House of Lords, persuaded the Queen to create twelve new peers. Smollett.

4. To make certain or confident, followed by a pronoun; as, to ascertain us of the goodness of our work. [Unusual.]—5. To fix; to establish with certainty; to render invariable, and not subject to will.

The mildness and precision of their laws ascertained the rule and measure of taxation. Gibbon.

ASCERTAINABLE, a. That may be made certain in fact, or certain to the mind; that may be certainly known or reduced to a certainty.

ASCERTAINED, pp. Made certain; defined; established; reduced to a certainty.

ASCERTAINER, n. The person who ascertains or makes certain.

ASCERTAINING, ppr. Making certain; fixing; establishing; reducing to a certainty; obtaining certain knowledge.

ASCERTAINMENT, n. The act of ascertaining; a reducing to certainty; certainty; fixed rule.

ASCES'SANCY, } See ACESCENCY, A-ASCES'SANT, } CESCENT.

ASCET'IC, a. [Gr. ασκητικος, exercised, hardened; from ασκεω, to exercise.] Retired from the world; rigid; severe: austere; employed in devotions and mortifications.

ASCET'IC, n. One who retires from the customary business of life, and devotes himself to the duties of piety and devotion; a hermit; a recluse.—2. The title of certain books on devout exercises; as, the Ascetics of St. Basil.

ASCET'ICISM, n. The practice of ascetics.

AS'CI, n. [Gr. ασκος, a bottle.] Little membranous bags or bladders, in which the seed-like reproductive particles, or spores of lichens, fungi, &c., are enclosed.

AS'CIAN, n. [L. ascii, from Gr. α priv. and σκια, a shadow.] A person, who, at certain times of the year, has no shadow at noon. The inhabitants of the torrid zone are called Ascians, or Ascii, because having the sun twice a year in their zenith at noon, they have then no shadow. They are also called Amphiscians, or Amphiscii, because when not shadowless, their shadows will, at one time of the year point north at mid-day, and at another time south.

ASCID'IA, n. A genus of molluscous animals, belonging to Cuvier's order of Acephala, without shells.

ASCID'IUM, n. In bot. a pitcher-like appendage, found in some plants, and formed by a folded-leaf, or leaf-stalk. It is often closed by a lid, as in the true pitcher-plant. The pitcher contains fluid in its young state, which gradually evaporates after the lid opens.

AS'CITANS, n. [Gr. ασκος, a bag or bottle of skin.] A sect or branch of Montanists, who appeared in the second century. They introduced into their assemblies, certain bacchanals, who danced around a bag or skin distended with air, in allusion to the bottles filled with new wine, Mat. ix.

ASCI'TES, n. [Gr. ασκος, a bladder.] A dropsy, or tense elastic swelling of the belly, with fluctuation, from a collection of water.

ASCIT'IC, } a. Belonging to an as-
ASCIT'ICAL, } cites; dropsical; hydropical

ASCITI''TIOUS, a. [L. ascitus; Low. L. ascititius; from asciso, to take to or associate.] Additional; added; supplemental; not inherent or original.

Homer has been reckoned an ascititious name. Pope.

ASCLE'PIAD, n. In ancient poetry, a verse of four feet, the first of which is a spondee, the second a choriamb, and the last two, dactyls; or of four feet and a cesura, the first a spondee, the second a dactyl, then the cesura, followed by two dactyls; as,

Mæcē | nās ătă | vis | ēdĭtĕ | rēgĭbŭs.

ASCLEPIADA'CEÆ, n. A nat. order of dicotyledonous plants, which is known from all others by the single character of its grains of pollen adhering together within a sort of bag, which occupies the whole of the inside of each cell of the anther; and when it falls out, sticks to glands of a peculiar character, occupying the angles of the stigma. Asclepias is the name of the largest genus of this order. It consists of shrubs or herbaceous plants abounding in an acrid and usually milky juice, and chiefly found in tropical countries. Some of the species of Asclepias have emetic properties, and have been used as substitutes for ipecacuanha.

ASCLEPIA'DIC, a. Belonging to a particular kind of verse, viz., the Asclepiad, invented by Asclepias.

ASCRIBABLE, a. [See ASCRIBE.] That may be ascribed or attributed.

ASCRIBE, v. t. [L. ascribo, of ad and scribo, to write; Eng. scrape.] 1. To attribute, impute, or set to, as to a cause; to assign, as effect to a cause; as, losses are often to be ascribed to imprudence. —2. To attribute, as a quality, or an appurtenance; to consider or allege to belong; as, to ascribe perfection to God, or imperfection to man; Job xxxvi.; Ps. lxviii.; 1 Sam. xviii.

ASCRIBED, pp. Attributed or imputed; considered or alleged, as belonging.

ASCRIBING, ppr. Attributing; imputing; alleging to belong.

ASCRIP'TION, n. The act of ascribing, imputing or affirming to belong.

ASCRIPTI''TIOUS, a. That is ascribed. This word is applied to villains under the feudal system, who are annexed to the freehold and transferable with it.

ASEL'LI, n. Two fixed stars of the fourth magnitude in the constellation cancer.

ASH, n. [Sax. æsc; Dan. ask; Germ. esche; D. esche; Russ. yassen.] 1. A well known tree, the Fraxinus excelsior.—2. The wood of the ash tree.

ASH, a. Pertaining to or like the ash; made of ash.—Ash keys or Ashen keys. In her., a name given to the fruit of ash trees which are borne in coat armour.

Ash Keys.

ASHAME,† v. t. To shame.

ASHAMED, a. [from Sax. gescamian or ascamian, to be ashamed, to blush, from scama, shame; originally a participle. See SHAME.] 1. Affected by shame; abashed or confused by guilt or a conviction of some criminal action or indecorous conduct, or by the exposure of some gross errors or misconduct, which the person is conscious must be wrong, and which tends to impair his honour or reputation. It is followed by of.

Thou shall remember thy ways, and be ashamed; Ex. xvi.

Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel; Hosea xx.

2. Confused by a consciousness of guilt or of inferiority, by the mortification of pride, by failure or disappointment.

They shall be greatly ashamed that trust in images; Isa. xlii.

[This adjective always follows its noun.]

ASHAMEDLY,† adv. Bashfully.

ASH'-COLOURED, a. Of a colour between brown and gray.

ASH'EN, a. [See ASH.] Pertaining to ash; made of ash.

ASH'ERY, n. A place for ashes.

ASH'ES, n. plur. without the singular number. [Sax. asca; Goth. azga; D. asch; G. asche.] 1. The earthy particles of combustible substances remaining after combustion; as of wood or coal.—Sedimentary ashes, or Ash, in geol., a term applied to ashes, and cinders deposited in beds by the agency of water, after having been ejected from fissures or craters into the sea; prevalent in the Grauwacke group.—2. The remains of the human body when burnt. Hence figuratively, a dead body or corpse.—3. In scripture, ashes is used to denote vileness, meanness, frailty, or humiliation.

I who am but dust and ashes; Gen. xviii.

I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes; Job xlii.

ASH'-FIRE, n. A low fire used in chemical operations.

ASH'-HOLE, n. A repository for ashes; the lower part of a furnace.

ASH'LAR, or ASH'LER, n. Freestones, roughly squared in the quarry.—2. Hewn stones used for the facing of walls, presenting a surface varied according to the tooling they receive Thus there are tooled, random-tooled plane, grooved, chiselled, and rusticated ashlar.

ASH'LERING, n Quartering for lathing to, in garrets, two or three feet high, perpendicular to the floor, and reaching to the under side of the rafters.

ASHORE, adv. [a, at, or on, and shore. See SHORE.] 1. On shore; on the land adjacent to water; to the shore; as, bring the goods ashore.—2. On land, opposed to aboard; as, the captain of the ship remained ashore.—3. On the ground; as, the ship was driven ashore.

ASHTAROTH, ASHTORETH, ASTORETH, ASTA'RTE, n. The name of a Phenician goddess, whose worship was introduced by Solomon among the children of Israel.

With these in troops
Came Astoreth, whom the Phenicians called Astarte, Queen of Heaven, with crescent horns. Milton.

Mooned Ashtaroth. Milton.

ASH-WEDNESDAY, n. The first day of Lent; supposed to be so called from a custom in the Romish church of sprinkling ashes, that day, on the heads of penitents, then admitted to penance. The fast of Ash-Wednesday was instituted by Pope Felix III., A. D. 487.

ASH'-WEED, n. A plant, the small wild angelica, gout-wort, goats-foot, or herb-gerard.

ASH'Y, a. Belonging to ashes; ash-coloured; pale; inclining to a whitish gray.

ASH'Y-PALE, a. Pale as ashes.

A'SIA, n. One of the four quarters of the globe. [A name originally given to Asia Minor or some part of it; perhaps from the Asses, Ases or Osses, about Mount Taurus.]

A'SIAN, a. Pertaining to Asia.

A'SIARCH, n. [Asia and ἀρχὸς, chief.] A chief or pontiff of Asia; one who had the superintendence of the public games; Acts xix.

ASIAT'IC, a. Belonging to Asia; a quarter of the globe which extends from the strait of Constantinople and the Arabian gulf, to the Pacific ocean on the east. It is probable, the name was originally appropriated to what is now Asia Minor, or rather a part of it.

ASIAT'IC, n. A native of Asia.

ASIAT'ICISM, n. Imitation of the Asiatic manner.

ASIDE, adv. [a and side. See SIDE.] 1. On or to one side; out of a perpendicular or straight direction.—2. At a little distance from the main part or body.

Thou shalt set aside that which is full; 2 Kings iv.

3. From the body; as, to put or lay aside a garment; John xiii.—4. From the company; at a small distance, or in private; as when speakers utter something by themselves, upon the stage.—5. Separate from the person, mind, or attention; in a state of abandonment.

Let us lay aside every weight; Heb. xii.

6. Out of the line of rectitude or propriety, in a moral view.

They are all gone aside; Ps. xiv.

7. In a state of separation to a particular use; as, to set aside a thing for a future day.—To set aside, in judicial proceedings, is to defeat the effect or operation of, by a subsequent decision of a superior tribunal; as, to set aside a verdict or a judgment.

ASINE'GO, n. [Sp. asnico, a little ass.] A foolish fellow.

AS'ININE, rarely AS'INARY, a. [L. asinus; W. asyn, the ass; which see.] Belonging to the ass; having the qualities of the ass.

ASI'TIA, n. [Gr. α priv. and σιτος, thirst.] Among physicians, a loathing of food.

ASK, v. t. [Sax. ascian, acsian, or axian; Ir. ascaim; Gr. ἀξιοω. Qu. Eth. ashu, to pray or beseech. In former times, the English word was pronounced ax, as in the royal style of assenting to bills in parliament. "Be it as it is axed." In Calmuc, asoc signifies to inquire. The sense is to urge or press.] 1. To request; to seek to obtain by words; to petition; with of in the sense of from, before the person to whom the request is made.

Ask counsel of God; Judges xviii.

2. To require, expect or claim.

To whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more; Luke xii.

3. To interrogate, or inquire; to put a question, with a view to an answer.

He is of age, ask him; John ix.

4. To require, or make claim.

Ask me never so much dowry; Gen. xxxiv.; Dan. ii.

5. To claim, require, or demand, as the price or value of a commodity; to set a price; as, what price do you ask?—6. To require, as physically necessary.

The exigence of a state asks a much longer time to conduct the design to maturity. Addison.

This sense is nearly or entirely obsolete; ask being superseded by require and demand.—7. To invite; as, to ask guests to a wedding or entertainment; ask my friend to step into the house.

ASK, v. i. To request or petition, followed by for; as, ask for bread; or without for.

Ask, and it shall be given you; Mat. vii.

2. To inquire, or seek by request; sometimes followed by after.

Wherefore dost thou ask after my name? Gen. xxxii.

This verb can hardly be considered as strictly intransitive, for some person or object is always understood. Ask is not equivalent to demand, claim, and require, at least, in modern usage; much less is it equivalent to beg and beseech. The first three words, demand, claim, require, imply a right or supposed right in the person asking, to the thing requested; and beseech implies more urgency than ask. Ask and request imply no right, but suppose the thing desired to be a favour. The French demander is correctly rendered by ask rather than by demand.

ASKANC'E or ASKAUNC'E, ASKANT' or ASKAUNT', adv. [D. schuins, sloping.] Awry; sideways; obliquely; towards one corner of the eye.

ĀSKED, pp. Requested; petitioned: questioned; interrogated.

ASKEW', adv. [G. schief; Dan. skiæv; D. scheef, awry, crooked, oblique.] With a wry look; aside; askant; sometimes indicating scorn, or contempt, or envy.

ĀSKING, ppr. Requesting; petitioning; interrogating; inquiring.—2. Silently expressing request or desire.

Explain the asking eye. Pope.

ASLAKE,† v. t. [Sax. aslacian. See SLACK.] To remit; to slacken.

ASLA'NI, n. A silver coin worth from 115 to 120 aspers. [See ASPER.]

ASLĀNT', a. or adv. [a and slant. See SLANT.] On one side; obliquely; not perpendicularly or with a right angle.

The shaft drove through his neck aslant. Dryden.

ASLEEP', a. or adv. [a and sleep, or Sax. geslapen, to sleep.] 1. Sleeping; in a state of sleep; at rest.

Sisera was fast asleep; Judges iv.

2. A state of sleep; as, to fall asleep.—3. Figuratively used for dead; in a state of death.

Concerning them who are asleep, sorrow not; 1 Thess. iv.

For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue; 2 Pet. iii.

ASLŌPE, a. or adv. [a and slope. See SLOPE.] With leaning or inclination; obliquely; with declivity or descent, as a hill; declining from an upright direction.

Set them not upright, but aslope. Bacon.

ASLUG',† adv. In a sluggish manner.

ASMONE'AN, a. Pertaining to Asmoneus, the father of Simon, and chief of the Asmoneans, a family that reigned over the Jews 126 years.

ASMONE'AN, n. One of the family of Asmoneus.

ASO'MATOUS, a. [Gr. α priv. and σωμα, body.] Without a material body; incorporeal.

ĀSP, ĀSP'IC, n. [L. aspis; Gr. ασπις, a round shield and an asp; supposed to be from Heb. and Ch. אסף, asp, to gather in, or collect; from the coil of this serpent, with his head elevated in the centre, like the boss of a buckler.] A small poisonous serpent of Egypt and Libya, whose bite occasions inevitable death, but without pain. It is said that the celebrated Cleopatra, rather than be carried a captive to Rome by Augustus, suffered death by the bite of the asp; but the fact has been questioned. It is now generally believed that the Naja haje, a congener of the Cobra da Capello, or Spectacle-snake, Naja tripudians, is the true Aspic of the ancients. Credible authorities state that oriental jugglers, by compressing the cervical spine of the haje between the finger and thumb, can throw it into a state of catalepsy; thus rendering the whole animal stiff and motionless. This trick is called changing the serpent into a rod or stick.

ASPAL'ATHUS, n. A genus of plants found at the Cape of Good Hope, and belonging to the nat. order Leguminosæ.

ASPAR'AGIN, n. A crystallized substance discovered in the juice of asparagus. It is an aspartate of ammonia, or rather asparamid.

ASPARA'GINOUS, a. Belonging to asparagus. Asparaginous plants, in horti., a term used to signify all those culinary vegetables, the points of the tender shoots of which in spring, when they newly emerge from the soil, are eaten in the same manner as those of asparagus.

ASPAR'AGUS, n. [L. and Gr.; probably from σπαρασσω, to tear, from its lacerated appearance, or from the root of σπυρα, a spire, from its stem.] Sparagus; sperage; vulgarly, sparrowgrass; a genus of plants. That which is cultivated in gardens, has an upright herbaceous stalk, bristly leaves, and equal stipulas. The roots have a bitterish mucilaginous taste; and the stalk is, in some degree, aperient and deobstruent, but not very efficacious. The plant has an underground perennial stem. The part eaten is the young shoot covered with scales in place of leaves. Botanically the shoot is called a Turio.

ASPAR'AMID, n. A modification of aspartate of ammonia, in which one equivalent of the hydrogen of the ammonia, and one equivalent of the oxygen of the acid, have left the salt and formed water: the remaining compound is asparamid.

ASPAR'TATE, n. Any compound of the aspartic acid with a salifiable base.

ASPAR'TIC ACID, n. When asparagin is boiled with magnesia, it is resolved into ammonia, and a peculiar acid, which has received the name of aspartic acid. It is composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen.

ĀSPECT, n. [L. aspectus, from aspicio, to look on, of ad and specio, to see or look.] 1. Look; view; appearance to the eye or the mind; as, to present an object or a subject in its true aspect, or under a double aspect. So we say, public affairs have a favourable aspect. 2. Countenance; look, or particular appearance of the face; as a mild or severe aspect.—3. View; sight; act of seeing. [This sense is now unusual.]—4 Position or situation with regard to seeing, or that position which enables one to look in a particular direction; as, a house has a southern aspect, that is, a position which faces or looks to the south.—5 In astr., the situation of one planet with respect to another. The aspects are five; sextile, when the planets are 60° distant; quartile, or quadrate, when their distance is 90°, or the quarter of a circle; trine, when the distance is 120°; opposition, when the distance is 180°, or half a circle; and conjunction, when they are in the same degree. Only the two last of these five terms are now used. Aspect, in her., is expressive of an animal full faced or guardant.

Aspectant.

ASPECT,† v. t. To behold.

ASPECT'ABLE,† a. That may be seen.

ASPE'CTANT or ASPE'CTING. Terms used in her., when two beasts, birds, &c., are borne face to face, or opposite to each other.

ASPECT'ED,† a. Having an aspect.

ASPEC'TION,† n. The act of viewing.

ASP'EN or ASP, n. [D. esp; Sax. æspe; S. asp; Qu. from the Ar. gashafa, to be agitated.] A species of the poplar, (populus tremula,) so called from the trembling of its leaves, which move with the slightest impulse of the air. Its leaves are roundish, smooth, and stand on long slender foot-stalks. It is found native on many of the Scottish mountains; and the trembling of the leaves is said to depend on the peculiar flattening of the leaf-stalk.

ASP'EN, a. Pertaining to the aspen, or resembling it; made of aspen wood.

Nor aspen leaves confess the gentlest breeze. Gay.

AS'PER, a. [L. See ASPERATE.] Rough; rugged. [Lit. us.]

AS'PER, n. [L. aspiro, to breathe.] In grammar, the Greek accent ('), importing that the letter over which it is placed ought to be aspirated, or pronounced as if the letter h preceded it.

AS'PER, n. A Turkish coin, of which three make a medine. Its value is about three-fifths of a penny.

AS'PERATE, v. t. [L. aspero, from asper, rough.] To make rough or uneven.

AS'PERATED, pp. Made rough, or uneven.

ASPERA'TION, n. A making rough.

ASPERGIL'LIFORM, a. [from L. aspergillus, the brush with which holy water is scattered about in Roman Catholic places of worship.] Any thing shaped like an aspergillus; a mushroom-like plant found in mould, it is chiefly used in speaking of the stigmas of grasses.

ASPERIFO'LIÆ, n. A nat. order of plants, corresponding to the Boraginaceæ of the present day. The seeds are not truly naked as stated by Linnæus.

ASPERIFO'LIATE, a. [L. asper, rough, and folium, a leaf.] Having rough leaves. Plants of this kind are, by some authors, classified according to this character. They constitute the forty-first order of Linnæus's fragments of a natural method. In the methods of Hermann, Boerhaave, and Ray, this class consists of plants which have four naked seeds. Their leaves stand alternately on the stalks, and the flower is monopetalous in five divisions.

ASPERIFO'LIOUS, a. Having leaves rough to the touch. [See the preceding word.]

ASPER'ITY, n. [L. asperitas, from asper, rough.] 1. Roughness of surface; unevenness; opposed to smoothness.—2. Roughness of sound; that quality which grates the ear; harshness of pronunciation.—3. Roughness to the taste; sourness.—4. Roughness or ruggedness of temper; moroseness; sourness; crabbedness.—5. Sharpness.

ASPER'MOUS, a. [Gr. α without, and σπερμα, seed.] Destitute of seed.

AS'PEROUS, a. [L. asper, rough.] Rough; uneven.

ASPERSE, v. t. (aspers'.) [L. aspergo, aspersus, of ad and spargo, to scatter; Ar. faraqa, to split, divide, scatter.] 1. To bespatter with foul reports or false and injurious charges; to tarnish in point of reputation, or good name; to slander or calumniate; as, to asperse a poet or his writings; to asperse a character.—2. To cast upon.

ASPERS'ER, n. One that asperses, or vilifies another.

ASPER'SION, n. A sprinkling, as of water or dust, in a literal sense.—2. The spreading of calumnious reports or charges, which tarnish reputation, like the bespattering of a body with foul water.

ASPERS'ORY, a. Tending to asperse; defamatory.

ASPHALT' } n. [Gr. ἀσφαλτος.] Bitumen Judaicum,
ASPHALT'UM, } Jew's pitch; a smooth, hard, brittle, black or brown substance, which breaks with a polish, melts easily when heated, and when pure, burns without leaving any ashes. It has little taste, and scarcely any smell, unless heated, when it emits a strong smell of pitch. It is found in a soft or liquid state on the surface of the Dead Sea, which, from this substance, is called Asphaltite, or the Asphaltic Lake. It is found also in the earth, in many parts of Asia, Europe, and America. Formerly, it was used for embalming dead bodies: the solid asphalt is still employed in Arabia, Egypt and Persia, instead of pitch for ships; and the fluid asphalt is used for varnishing, and for burning in lamps. A species found in Neufchatel is found excellent as a cement for walls and pavements; very durable in air, and not penetrable by water. A composition of asphalt, lamp-black, and oil, is used for drawing black figures on dial-plates. Of late years, Asphaltum has been strongly recommended to public notice, as excellently adapted for covering roofs, floors, for flagstones in pavements, and for various other useful purposes. When prepared for these purposes, it receives the name of Asphaltic Cement. The Asphalt which the proper cement is made of, is an admixture of bitumen with limestone rock of the Jura formation.

ASPHALT'IC, a. Pertaining to asphalt, or containing it; bituminous.

ASPHALT'ITE, a. Pertaining to, or containing asphalt.

AS'PHODEL, n. [L. and Gr. See Theoph. lib. 7; Plin. lib. 21, 17. Perhaps it is from the root of spud; Sw. spyd; Ice. spioot, a spear, from the shape of its leaves.] King's spear, a genus of plants, belonging to the tribe Asphodeleæ. It consists of liliaceous plants, &c., cultivated for the beauty of their flowers. The ancients planted asphodels near graves, to supply the manes of the dead with nourishment.

ASPHODE'LEÆ, n. The asphodel tribe. They are monocotyledonous plants, which form a very natural assemblage, for the most part easily recognized. Their fruit is either dry or succulent, and their seeds have a brittle coat. To this tribe belong the onion, garlic, hyacinth, squill, star of Bethlehem, and aloes, with their thick fleshy leaves, and forked stems.

ASPHU'RELATES, n. [Gr. α priv. and σφυρα, a hammer; not malleable.] A series of semimetallic fossils, fusible by fire, and in their purest state not malleable. In their native state, they are mixed with sulphur and other adventitious matter, in the form of ore. Under this denomination are classed bismuth, antimony, cobalt, zinc, and quicksilver.

ASPHYX'Y, n. [Gr. ἀσφυξια, of α priv. and σφυξις, pulse.] A temporary suspension of the motion of the heart and arteries; swooning; fainting.

ASPLE'NIUM, n. A genus of plants, of the class Cryptogamia, and order Filices. To it belong the leek, fern, or black maiden-hair, spleen wort, mule's fern, wall rue, common-maiden hair.

ASPORTA'TION, n. [L. asportatio, of abs and porto, to carry; W. porthi, to carry. See BEAR.] A carrying away. In law, the felonious removal of goods from the place where they were deposited, is an asportation, and adjudged to be theft, though the goods are not carried from the house or apartment.

ASQUINT', adv. [D. schuinte, a slope; schuins, slopingly; D. kant, a corner. See ASKANCE and SQUINT.] 1. To the corner or angle of the eye; obliquely; toward one side; not in the straight line of vision; as, to look asquint.—2. Not with regard or due notice.

ASS, n. [W. asyn; Ir. asan; L. asinus; Fr. âne, for asne. Qu. from Goth. auso, Gr. οὐς, an ear.] 1. A quadruped of the equine genus. This animal has long slouching ears, a short mane, and a tail covered with long hairs at the end. He is usually of an ash colour, with a black bar across the shoulders. The tame or domestic ass is patient to stupidity, and carries a heavy burden. He is slow, but very sure footed, and for this reason very useful on rough steep hills.—2. A dull, heavy, stupid fellow; a dolt.

ASSĀI, [It.] A term in music; added to a word signifying slow, it denotes a little quicker; and to a word signifying quick, it denotes a little slower.

ASSĀIL, v. t. [Fr. assaillir, from L. assilio, to leap or rush upon, of ad and salio, to leap, to rise.] 1. To leap or fall upon by violence; to assault; to attack suddenly, as when one person falls upon another to beat him.—2. To invade or attack, in a hostile manner, as an army or nation.—3. To attack with arguments, censure, abuse, or criticism, with a view to injure, bring into disrepute, or overthrow.—4. To attack with a view to overcome, by motives applied to the passions.

> Nor hide the encounter of assailing eyes. Shak.

ASSĀILABLE, a. That may be assailed, attacked, or invaded.

ASSĀILANT, n. [Fr.] One who assails, attacks, or assaults.

ASSĀILANT, a. Assaulting; attacking; invading with violence. Assailant, assaultant, or assaulting, heraldic terms, applied to several beasts borne in coat armour, when placed rather bendwise than mounted upright.

ASSĀILED, pp. Assaulted; invaded; attacked with violence.

ASSĀILER, n. One who assails.

ASSĀILING, ppr. Assaulting; invading by force; attacking with violence.

ASSĂRT, n. [Old Fr. assarter, to grub up.] 1. In ancient laws, the offence of grubbing up trees, and thus destroying thickets or coverts of a forest.—2. A tree plucked up by the roots; also a piece of land cleared.

ASSĂRT, v. t. To grub up trees; to commit an assart.

ASSAS'SIN, n. [Ar. hassa, to kill.] One who kills or attempts to kill by surprise, or secret assault. The circumstance of surprise or secrecy seems essential to the signification of this word, though it is sometimes used to denote one who takes any advantage, in killing, or attempting to murder; as, by attacking one when unarmed.

ASSAS'SINATE, v. t. To kill or attempt to kill by surprise, or secret assault; to murder by sudden violence.

Assassin, as a verb, is not now used.—2. To waylay; to take by treachery.

ASSAS'SINATE,† n. A murder or murderer.

ASSAS'SINATED, pp. Murdered by surprise or secret assault.

ASSAS'SINATING, ppr. Murdering by surprise or secret assault.

ASSASSINA'TION, n. The act of killing or murdering, by surprise or secret assault; murder by violence.

ASSASSINA'TOR, n. An assassin; which see.

ASSAS'SINOUS,† a. Murderous.

ASSAS'SINS, n. In Syria, a tribe or clan called Ismaelians, Batanists, or Batenians. They originated in Persia, about the year 1090; whence a colony migrated, and settled on the mountains of Lebanon, and were remarkable for their assassinations. Their religion was a compound of Magianism, Judaism, and Christianity. One article of their creed was, that the Holy Spirit resided in their chief, and that his orders proceeded from God himself. He was called Scheih, and is better known by the denomination of old man of the mountain. This barbarous chieftain and his followers spread terror among nations far and near, for almost two centuries, when the tribe was subdued by Sultan Bibaris.

ASSA'TION,† n. [Fr. from L. assatus.] A roasting.

ASSAULT', n. [Fr. assault, now assaut; from L. assulto, of ad and salto, to leap, formed on salio, or its root. See ASSAIL. We have the same root in insult and result.] 1. An attack or violent onset, whether by an individual, a company, or an army. An assault by private persons may be made with or without weapons. An assault by an army is a violent hostile attack; and when made upon a fort or fortified place, is called a storm, as opposed to sap or siege.—2. An attack by hostile words or measures; as, an assault upon the prerogatives of a prince, or upon a constitution of government.—3. In law, an unlawful setting upon one's person; an attempt or offer to beat another, without touching his person; as, by lifting the fist or a cane, in a threatening manner. If the blow aimed takes effect, it is a battery.

ASSAULT', v. t. To attack or fall upon by violence, or with a hostile intention; as, to assault a man, a house, or town.—2. To invade, or fall on with force; as, the cry of war assaults our ears.—3. To attack by words, arguments, or unfriendly measures, with a view to shake, impair, or overthrow; as, to assault a character, the laws, or the administration.

ASSAULT'ABLE, a. That may be assaulted.

ASSAULT'ED, pp. Attacked with force, arms, violence, or hostile views.

ASSAULT'ER, n. One who assaults, or violently attacks.

ASSAULT'ING, ppr. Attacking with force, or with hostile measures.

ASSĀY, n. [Fr. essai; It. saggio, an assay; Fr. essayer, to try; old Fr. essoyer, to endeavour; It. assaggiare, to try; saggiare, to try, essay; Sp. ensayar, to try; Sw. försökia, to try; Dan. forsöger, to try, examine, endeavour. These words are all from the same root as seek, the radical sense of which is, to follow, to urge, press, or strain; Sax. secan, to seek; L. sequor; assequor, to follow, to examine; It. seguire; Sp. seguir, to follow. Assay and essay are radically one word; but modern usage has appropriated assay to experiments in metallurgy, and essay to intellectual and bodily efforts. See ESSAY.] 1. The trial of the goodness, purity, weight, value, &c., of metals, or metallic substances. Any operation or experiment for ascertaining the quantity of a precious metal in an ore or mineral. Analysis is a term of more comprehensive import, extending to an examination of the nature and quantities of all parts of the compound. Assaying is called the docimastic art.—2. In law, an examination of weights and measures by the standard.—3. Examination; trial; effort; first entrance upon any business; attempt. In these senses, which are found in old authors, now rarely used. [See ESSAY.]—4.† Value; great purity.

ASSĀY, v. t. To try or prove, by examination or experiment, the quantity and purity of metallic substances.—2. To apply to the touchstone.

ASSĀY, v. i. To attempt, try, or endeavour.

He assayed to go; 1 Sam. xvii.

[In this sense essay is now used.]

ASSAY-BALANCE, n. A balance for the trial of the weight and purity of metals.

ASSAYED, pp. Examined; tested; proved by experiment.

ASSAYER, n. One who examines metals to find their quantity and purity. An officer of the Mint, whose business is to try the weight and purity of metals.

ASSAYING, ppr. Trying by some standard; examining metals, or ores, by experiment, in order to ascertain the quantity of gold or silver in them; or the quantity of any particular metal which is in connection with any other metal, or in a mineral; proving; attempting. There are two modes by which the art of assaying is performed, and sometimes the one is employed to corroborate the other. The one is called the humid process, by which a solution of the metals is effected by means of acids, after which those sought for are precipitated by proper re-agents. The other is called the dry process, and is performed by the agency of fire. The first is generally employed, for the purpose of estimating the quantity of gold, or silver, in an alloy; and the second is chiefly applied to minerals.

ASSAY-MASTER, n. An assayer; an officer appointed to try the weight and fineness of the precious metals.

ASSECU'RANCE,† n. Assurance.

ASSECURA'TION,† n. Assurance; a making secure.

ASSECURE,† v. t. To secure.

ASSECU'TION, n. [L. assequor.] An obtaining or acquiring.

ASSEM'BLAGE, n. [Fr. See ASSEMBLE.] 1. A collection of individuals, or of particular things; the state of being assembled.—2. Rarely, the act of assembling.

ASSEM'BLANCE,† n. Representation; an assembling.

ASSEM'BLE, v. t. [Fr. assembler; D. zamelen; Ger. sammeln, to assemble, L. simul; Dan. sammen; D. zamen, together.] To collect a number of individuals or particulars into one place, or body; to bring or call together; to convene; to congregate.

ASSEM'BLE, v. i. To meet, or come together; to convene, as a number of individuals.

ASSEM'BLED, pp. Collected into a body; congregated.

ASSEM'BLER, n. One who assembles.

ASSEM'BLING, ppr. Coming together; collected into one place.

ASSEM'BLING, n. A collection, or meeting together; Heb. x.

ASSEM'BLY, n. [Sp. asamblea; Fr. assemblée.] 1. A company, or collection of individuals in the same place; usually for the same purpose.—2. A congregation or religious society convened.—3. In some of the United States, the legislature, consisting of different houses, or branches, whether in session or not. In some states, the popular branch or House of Representatives is denominated an assembly.—4. A collection of persons for amusement; as, a dancing assembly.—5. A convocation, convention, or council of ministers and ruling elders, delegated from each presbytery; as, the General Assembly of Scotland, or of the United States.—6. In armies, the second beating of the drum before a march, when the soldiers strike their tents.—7.† An assemblage. Primary Assembly, in the United States, a meeting of the people or legal voters in a town or city, who appear and act on public business in person, and a majority of whose votes originate the supreme power in a state.

ASSEM'BLY-ROOM, n. A room in which persons assemble.

ASSENT', n. [L. assensus, from assentior, to assent, of ad and sentio, to think; Eth. sena, or sana, concord, and its derivative, to agree, to harmonize; Sw. sinne, mind, sense; D. zin, mind; zinnén, to feel, or mind; G. sinn, sense; sinnen, to think, or consider. The Danes preserve the final consonant, sind, mind, sense, inclination; W. syn, sense; syniaw, to perceive.] 1. The act of the mind in admitting, or agreeing to, the truth of a proposition.

Faith is the assent to any proposition, on the credit of the proposer. Locke.

2. Consent; agreement to a proposal, respecting some right or interest; as, the bill before the House has the assent of a great majority of the members. Royal assent, according to the British constitution, is the assent of the king to the bills that have passed the two houses of parliament. It may be given either by the king in person, through the medium of the clerk, the Commons being sent for, and standing at the bar, or it may be given by letters patent under the great seal, and signed by the king's own hand. The distinction between assent and consent, seems to be this: assent is the agreement to an abstract proposition. We assent to a statement, but we do not consent to it. Consent is an agreement to some proposal or measure which affects the rights or interest of the consenter. We consent to a proposal of marriage. This distinction, however, is not always observed. [See CONSENT.] Assent is an act of the understanding; consent is an act of the will. So Baxter speaks of justifying faith as the assenting trust of the understanding, and the consenting trust of the will.—3. Accord; agreement; 2 Chron. xviii.

ASSENT', v. i. To admit as true; to agree, yield, or concede, or rather to express an agreement of the mind to what is alleged, or proposed.

The Jews also assented, saying that these things were so; Acts xxiv.

It is sometimes used for consent, or an agreement to something affecting the rights or interest of the person assenting. But to assent to the marriage of a daughter, is less correct than to consent.

ASSENTA'TION, n. [L. assentatio, from assentor, to comply.] Compliance with the opinion of another, from flattery or dissimulation.

ASSENTA'TOR, n. A flatterer.

ASSENTATO'RILY,† adv. With adulation.

ASSENT'ER, n. One who assents, agrees to, or admits.

ASSENT'ING, ppr. Agreeing to, or admitting as true; yielding to.

ASSENT'INGLY, adv. In a manner to express assent; by agreement.

ASSENT'MENT, n. Assent; agreement. [Rarely used.]

ASSERT', v. t. [L. assero, assertum, to claim or challenge, to maintain or assert; of ad and sero. The sense of sero is to sow, properly to throw or set. To assert is to throw or set firmly.] 1. To affirm positively; to declare with assurance; to aver.—2. To maintain or defend by words or measures; to vindicate a claim or title to; as, to assert our rights and liberties.

ASSERT'ED, pp. Affirmed positively; maintained; vindicated.

ASSERT'ING, ppr. Declaring with confidence; maintaining; defending.

ASSESS', v. t. [Fr. asseoir; Norm. asser, asseoir; to settle, fix, ascertain, assess; L. assideo, ad and sedeo; Eng. to sit, or set. See SET and SIT.] 1. To set, fix or charge a certain sum upon one, as a tax; as, to assess each individual in due proportion.—2. To value; to fix the value of property, for the purpose of being taxed.—3. To set, fix or ascertain; as, it is the province of a jury to assess damages.

ASSESS',† n. Assessment.

ASSESS'ABLE, a. That may be assessed.

ASSESS'ABLY, adv. By assessment.

ASSESS'ED, pp. Charged with a certain sum; valued; set; fixed; ascertained.

ASSESS'ING, ppr. Charging with a sum; valuing; fixing; ascertaining.

ASSES'SION,† n. A sitting down by a person.

ASSES'SIONARY, a. Pertaining to assessors.

ASSESS'MENT, n. A valuation of property for the purpose of taxation. An assessment is a valuation made by authorized persons according to their discretion, as opposed to a sum certain or determined by law. It may be a direct charge of the tax to be paid; or a valuation of the property of those who are to pay the tax, for the purpose of fixing the proportion which each man shall pay; on which valuation the law imposes a specific sum upon a given amount.—2. A tax or specific sum charged on the person or property.—3. The act of assessing; the act of determining the amount of damages by a jury.

ASSESS'OR, n. One appointed to assess the person or property.—2. An inferior officer of justice, who sits to assist the judge.—3. One who sits by another, as next in dignity.

AS'SETS, n. plur. [Fr. assez, enough; It. assai, enough, or many; Ir. sath, sufficiency; sasadh; satisfaction; L. sat, satis, enough.] 1. Goods or estate of a deceased person, sufficient to pay the debts of the deceased. But the word sufficient, though expressing the original signification of assets, is not necessary to the definition. In present usage, assets are the money, goods, or estate of a deceased person, subject by law to the payment of his debts and legacies. Assets are real or personal; real assets are lands which descend to the heir, subject to the fulfilment of the obligations of the ancestor; personal assets are the money or goods of the deceased, or debts due to him, which come into the hands of the executor or administrator, or which he is bound to collect and convert into money.—2. Effects of an insolvent debtor.

ASSEV'ER, } v. t. [L. assevero,
ASSEV'ERATE, } from ad and the Teutonic swear; Sax. swerian; Goth. swaran, to swear, to affirm positively.] To affirm or aver positively, or with solemnity.

ASSEV'ERATED, pp. Affirmed or averred positively.

ASSEV'ERATING, ppr. Affirming positively.

ASSEVERA'TION, n. Positive affirmation or assertion; solemn declaration. This word is not generally, if ever, used for a declaration under an official oath, but for a declaration accompanied with solemnity.

ASS-HEAD, n. [Ass and head.] One dull, like the ass; one slow of apprehension; a blockhead.

ASSIDE'ANS or CHASIDE'ANS. [Heb. חסיד, chaste, pious.] A sect of Jews who resorted to Mattathias to fight for the laws of their God and the liberties of their country. They were men of great zeal, and observed the traditions of the elders. From these sprung the Pharisees and Essenes.

AS'SIDENT, a. [L. assideo, assidens, of ad and sedeo, to sit.] Assident signs, in med., are such as usually attend a disease, but not always; distinguished from pathognomic signs, which are inseparable from it.

ASSID'UATE,† a. Daily.

ASSIDU'ITY, n. [L. assiduitas. See ASSIDUOUS.] 1. Constant or close application to any business or enterprise; diligence.—2. Attention; attentiveness to persons. Assiduities, in the plural, are services rendered with zeal and constancy.

ASSID'UOUS, a. [L. assiduus, from assideo, to sit close, ad and sedeo; Eng. to sit; Sax. sittan, settan.] 1. Constant in application; as a person assiduous in his occupation.—2. Attentive; careful; regular in attendance; as, an assiduous physician or nurse.—3. Performed with constant diligence or attention; as, assiduous labour.

ASSID'UOUSLY, adv. Diligently; attentively; with earnestness and care; with regular attendance.

ASSID'UOUSNESS, n. Constant or diligent application.

ASSIENT'O, n. [Sp. asiento, a seat, a contract or agreement; L. assideo.] A contract or convention between the king of Spain and other powers, for furnishing slaves for the Spanish dominions in South America.

ASSIGN, v. t. (assine) [Fr. assigner; L. assigno, of ad and signo, to allot, to mark out; Ir. sighin; L. signum, a mark. The primary sense of sign is to send, or to set.] 1. To allot; to appoint or grant by distribution or apportionment.

The priests had a portion assigned them; Gen. xlvii.

2. To designate or appoint for a particular purpose.

They assigned Bezer, a city of refuge; Josh. xx.

3. To fix, specify or designate: as, an assigned quantity.—4. To make or set over; to transfer, sell, or convey, by writing, as by indorsing a note, or by any writing on a separate paper.—5. To allege or show in particular; as, to assign a reason for one's conduct.—6. In law, to show or set forth with particularity; as, to assign error in a writ; to assign false judgment. To assign a widow her dower, is to allot or portion out to a woman, the third part forming her dower. To assign a perjury, is to state upon what particular false statement of the party the false swearing is intended to be sustained; or in common parlance, "it is an oath upon which perjury may be assigned;" that is, the oath so absolutely certain and distinct in its allegation, that it can be negatived by evidence of its falsity.

ASSIGN, n. A person to whom property or an interest is or may be transferred; as, a deed to a man and his heirs and assigns.

ASSIGNABLE, a. That may be allotted, appointed, or assigned.—2. That may be transferred by writing; as, an assignable note, or bill.—3. ASSIZE, } n. [Fr. assises, and some-
ASSIZES, } times so written in English; L. assideo, to sit by, of ad and sedeo, to sit; Ir. siasair, a session. See ASSESS.] 1. Originally, an assembly of knights and other substantial men, with a bailiff or justice, in a certain place and at a certain time, for public business. The word was sometimes applied to the general council, or Wittenagemote, of England.—2. A court in England, held in every county by special commission to one of the judges, who is called a justice of the assize, and empowered to take assizes, that is, the verdict of a jury, called the assize.—3. A jury. In this sense the word was applied to the grand assize, for the trial of property, and to the petty assize, for the trial of possession. In Scotland, the assize consists of fifteen men, selected from a great number.—4. A writ; as an assize of novel disseisin, which is given to recover the possession of lands, tenements, rents, common, &c., of which the tenant has been lately disseised; assize of mort d'ancestor, which lies against an abator, who enters upon land after the death of the tenant, and before the heir enters; assize of darrein presentment, which lies against a stranger who presents a clerk to a benefice.—5 A particular species of rents, established and not subject to be varied.—6. The time or place of holding the court of assize.—7. In a more general sense, any court of justice.—8 A statute of regulation; an ordinance regulating the weight, measure, and price of articles sold in market; and hence the word came to signify the weight, measure, or price itself; as the assize of bread. This word is, in a certain sense, now corrupted into size; which see.

ASSIZE, v. t. To fix the weight, measure or price of commodities, by an ordinance or regulation of authority.

Union of persons in a company; a society formed for transacting or carrying on some business for mutual advantage; a partnership. It is often applied to a union of states or a confederacy.—3. Union of things; apposition, as of particles of matter.—4. Union or connection of ideas. An association of ideas is where two or more ideas constantly or naturally follow each other in the mind, so that one almost infallibly produces the other. Some of the most remarkable associating principles, according to Dugald Stewart, are resemblance, analogy, contrariety, vicinity in place, vicinity in time, relation of cause and effect, relation of means and ends, relation of premises and conclusions. The most powerful of all the associating principles is undoubtedly custom, and it is that which leads to the most important inquiries of a practical nature.—5. An exertion or change of some extreme part of the sensory residing in the muscles or organs of sense, in consequence of some antecedent or attendant fibrous contractions.—6. In eccles. affairs, a society of the clergy, consisting of a number of pastors of neighbouring churches, united for promoting the interests of religion and the harmony of the churches.

ASSOCIA'TIONAL, a. Pertaining to an association of clergymen.

ASSO'CIATIVE, a. Having the quality of associating, or of being affected by sympathy.

ASSO'CIATOR, n. A confederate. [Associate is now used.]

ASSOIL', v. t. [Old Fr. from L. absolvo.] To solve; to release; to absolve.

ASSOIL',† v. t. [Fr. souiller.] To soil; to stain.

ASSOIL'MENT, n. Act of assoiling.

ASSOIL'ZIE, or ASSOIL'YIE, v. t. In Scots law, 1. To acquit; to free a party from a charge or prosecution, or to find a criminal not guilty.—2. To absolve from ecclesiastical censure.

AS'SONANCE, n. [Fr. from L. ad and sono, to sound. See SOUND.] Resemblance of sounds. In rhet. and poetry, a resemblance in sound, or termination, without making rhyme.

AS'SONANT, a. Having a resemblance of sounds. In Spanish poetry, assonant rhymes are those in which a resemblance of sounds serves instead of a natural rhyme, as, ligera, tierra.

ASSORT', v. t. [Fr. assortir; It. assortire; of ad and sortir, sortire, to sally forth, and in It. to draw lots. See SORT.] 1. To separate and distribute into classes things of the like kind, nature, or quality, or things which are suited to a like purpose. It is some times applied to persons as well as things.—2. To furnish with all sorts.

ASSORT′, v. i. To agree; to be in accordance with; to suit.

ASSORT′ED, pp. Distributed into sorts, kinds, or classes.—2. Furnished with an assortment; or with a variety; as a well assorted store.

ASSORT′ING, ppr. Separating into sorts; supplying with an assortment.

ASSORT′MENT, n. The act of distributing into sorts, kinds, or classes, or of selecting and suiting things.—2. A mass or quantity distributed into kinds or sorts; or a number of things assorted.—3. A number of things of the same kind, varied in size, colour, quality, price, form, or the like, to suit the market, the wants of people, or various purposes; as, an assortment of thread, of silks, of calicoes, &c.

> An assortment of paintings. W. Coxe.

4. A variety of sorts or kinds adapted to various wants, demands, or purposes; as, an assortment of goods.

ASSOT′,† v. t. [See SOT.] To infatuate; to besot.

ASSUĀGE, v. t. [This word appears to be formed on the G. schwach; D. zwak, weak; or on D. zagt, soft, gentle, quiet, which coincides with the Sax. swig, silence; swigan, to be silent, whence geswigean, to be silent; D. zwygen, id. In Sax. also, geswican, is to cease, fail, rest, be quiet. But the Dutch word for assuage, is verzagten, to soften.] To soften, in a figurative sense: to allay, mitigate, ease, or lessen, as pain or grief; to appease or pacify, as passion or tumult. In strictness, it signifies rather to moderate, than to quiet, tranquillize, or reduce to perfect peace or ease.

ASSUĀGE, v. i. To abate or subside.

> The waters assuaged; Gen. viii.

But I apprehend the sense is—the waters were checked; Heb. שך, shad.

ASSUĀGED, pp. Allayed; mitigated; eased; appeased.

ASSUĀGEMENT, n. Mitigation; abatement.

ASSUĀGER, n. One who allays; that which mitigates or abates.

ASSUĀGING, ppr. Allaying; mitigating; appeasing; abating.

ASSŪME, v. t. [L. assumo, of ad and sumo, to take.] 1. To take, or take upon one. It differs from receive, in not implying an offer to give.

> The god assumed his native form again. Pope.

2. To take what is not just; to take with arrogant claims; to arrogate; to seize unjustly; as, to assume haughty airs; to assume unwarrantable powers.—3. To take for granted, or without proof; to suppose as a fact; as, to assume a principle in reasoning.—4. To appropriate, or take to one's self; as, to assume the debts of another.—5. To take what is fictitious; to pretend to possess; to take in appearance; as, to assume the garb of humility.

ASSŪME, v. i. To be arrogant; to claim more than is due.—2. In law, to take upon one's self an obligation; to undertake or promise; as, A assumed upon himself, and promised to pay.

ASSŪMED, pp. Taken; arrogated; taken without proof; pretended.

ASSŪMER, n. One who assumes; an arrogant person.

ASSŪMING, ppr. Taking; arrogating; taking for granted; pretending.

ASSŪMING, a. Taking or disposed to take upon one's self more than is just; haughty; arrogant.

ASSŪMING, n. Presumption.

ASSUMP′SIT, n. [Pret. tense of L. assumo.] 1. In law, a promise, or undertaking, founded on a consideration. This promise may be verbal or written. An assumpsit is express or implied; express, when made in words or writing; implied, when in consequence of some benefit or consideration accruing to one person from the acts of another, the law presumes that person has promised to make compensation. In this case, the law, upon a principle of justice, implies or raises a promise, on which an action may be brought to recover the compensation. Thus, if A contracts with B to build a house for him, by implication and intendment of law, A promises to pay B for the same, without any express words to that effect.—2. An action founded on a promise. When this action is brought on a debt, it is called indebitatus assumpsit, which is an action on the case to recover damages for the non-payment of a debt.

ASSUMPT′,† v. t. To take up; to raise.

ASSUMPT′,† n. That which is assumed.

ASSUMP′TION, n. [L. assumptio.] 1. The act of taking to one's self.—2. The act of taking for granted, or supposing a thing without proof; supposition.

> This gives no sanction to the unwarrantable assumption that the soul sleeps from the period of death to the resurrection of the body. Thodey.

3. The thing supposed; a postulate or proposition assumed. In logic, the minor or second proposition in a categorical syllogism.—4. A consequence drawn from the propositions of which an argument is composed.—5. Undertaking; a taking upon one's self.—6. In the Romish Church, the taking up a person into heaven, as the Virgin Mary. Also, a festival in honour of the miraculous ascent of Mary, celebrated by the Romish and Greek churches.—7. Adoption. Deed of assumption, in Scots law, a deed executed by trustees, under a trust deed, or deed of settlement, assuming a new trustee, or trustees.

ASSUMP′TIVE, a. That is or may be assumed. In her., assumptive arms are such as a person has a right, with the approbation of his sovereign and of the heralds, to assume, in consequence of an exploit. Assumptive arms, may also be considered as armorial bearings improperly assumed.

ASSUMP′TIVELY, adv. By way of assumption.

ASSU′RANCE, n. (ashu′rance.) [Fr. from assurer, of ad and sûr, seur, sure, certain. Qu. the Rab. and Talm. אשר, asher, to make firm, confirm, verify; or is sur the G. zwar, from the root of L. verus; more probably it is from It. sicurare, assicurare, to insure, from L. securus.] 1. The act of assuring, or of making a declaration in terms that furnish ground of confidence; as, I trusted to his assurances; or the act of furnishing any ground of full confidence.

> Whereof he hath given assurance to all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead; Acts xvii.

2. Firm persuasion; full confidence or trust; freedom from doubt; certain expectation; the utmost certainty.

ASSŪRE, v. t. (ashūre.) [Fr. assurer. See ASSURANCE.] 1. To make certain; to give confidence by a promise, declaration, or other evidence; as, he assured me of his sincerity.—2. To confirm; to make certain, or secure.

> And it shall be assured to him; Lev. xxvii.

3. To embolden; to make confident.

> And hereby we shall assure our hearts before him; 1 John iii.

4. To make secure, with of before the object secured; as, let me be assured of your fidelity.—5.† To affiance; to betroth.—6. To insure; to covenant, to indemnify for loss. [See INSURE.]

ASSŪRED, pp. Made certain or confident; made secure; insured.

ASSŪRED, a. Certain, indubitable; not doubting; bold to excess.

ASSŪREDLY, adv. Certainly; indubitably.

> Assuredly thy son Solomon shall reign; 1 Kings i.

ASSŪREDNESS, n. The state of being assured; certainty; full confidence.

ASSŪRER, n. One who assures; one who insures against loss; an insurer or underwriter.

ASSUR′GENT, a. [L. assurgens, assurgo.] Rising upward in an arch. In her., a term used for man or beast, when depicted as rising out of the sea. In bot., rising in a curve to an erect position. Assurgent leaves, leaves first bent down, but rising erect towards the apex.

ASSŪRING, ppr. Making sure or confident; giving security; confirming.

ASSWĀGE. See ASSUAGE.

ASSYTH′EMENT, n. In Scots law, an indemnification due to the heirs of a person murdered, from the person guilty of the crime; but where the criminal has suffered the pains of law, no claim for assythement lies.

AS′TACITE, } n. [Gr. αστακος, a
AS′TACOLITE, } crawfish, and λιθος, a stone.] Petrified or fossil crawfish, and other crustaceous animals; called also cancrites, crabites, and gammarolites.

AS′TEISM, n. [Gr. αστειος, beautiful, polite.] In rhet., genteel irony; a polite and ingenious manner of deriding another.

AS′TER, n. [Gr. αστηρ.] A genus of plants, with compound flowers, many of which are cultivated for their beauty, particularly the China Aster. The species are very numerous. They are in common language called star-wort, from the rays of the corolla.

ASTE′RIA, n. A variety of sapphire, not perfectly transparent, but showing a star-like opalescence in the direction of the axis, if cut round.

ASTE'RIAS, } n. [Gr. αστηρ, a star.] Stel-
AS'TER, } la marina, sea-star, or star-fish, a genus of the order of Mollusca. It has a depressed body, with a coriaceous coat; is composed of five or more segments running out from a central part, and furnished with numerous tentacles, with a mouth below, in the centre. There are many species.

ASTE'RIATED, a. [Supra.] Radiated; presenting diverging rays, like a star; as, asteriated sapphire.

ASTE'RIATITE, n. Petrified asterias.

AS'TERISK, n. [Gr. αστερισκος, a little star, from αστηρ, a star.] The figure of a star, thus, (*) used in printing and writing, as a reference to a passage or note in the margin, or to fill the space when a name is omitted.

AS'TERISM, n. [Gr. αστερισμος, a little star, from αστηρ, a star.] 1. A collection of stars, formerly used for constellation, but now appropriated to signify any small cluster which it is either desirable to distinguish from the rest of the constellation in which it lies, or which is not a part of any particular constellation.—2. An asterisk, or mark of reference. [This is less proper.]

AS'TERITE, or star-stone. [See ASTRITE.]

ASTERN', adv. [a or at, and stern. See STERN.] 1. In or at the hinder part of a ship; or toward the hinder part, or backward; as, to go astern.—2. Behind a ship, at any indefinite distance.

ASTEROID', n. [Gr. αστηρ, a star, and ειδος, form.] A name given by Herschel to the newly discovered planets, between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter.

ASTEROID'AL, a. Resembling a star; or pertaining to the asteroids, or star-fish.

ASTEROPHYLL'ITES, n. [Gr. αστηρ, a star, and φυλλον, a leaf.] Star-leaf, a genus of extinct fossil plants, so called from the stellated disposition of the leaves round the branches.

AS'TEROPODE, } n. αστηρ, a star,
ASTEROPO'DIUM, } and πους, ποδος, a foot.] A kind of extraneous fossil, of the same substance with the astrite, to which it serves as the base.

ASTERT',† v. t. To startle.

ASTHEN'IC, a. (aston'ic.) [Gr. α priv. and σθενος, strength.] Weak; characterized by debility.

ASTHENOL'OGY, n. [Gr. α priv. and σθενος, strength, and λογος, discourse.] The doctrine of diseases connected with debility.

ASTH'MA, n. (ast'ma.) [Gr. ασθμα.] An intermitting disorder of respiration. The paroxysm of this disorder terminates in expectoration, more or less copious. Asthma generally attacks persons advanced in years, and seems, in some instances, to be hereditary. Persons of a melancholic temperament, or of the melancholic mixed with the sanguineous, are most subject to it. The paroxysm is very generally preceded by languor, flatulency, headache, heaviness over the eyes, sickness, disturbed rest, and sense of oppression about the precordia. It generally takes place about the middle of the night, and during the first and deepest sleep. It seldom proves fatal, except as inducing dropsy, consumption, &c. Physicians distinguish two kinds of asthma, the dry or nervous, and the humid or common asthma.

ASTHMAT'IC, a. Pertaining to asthma; also, affected by asthma; as, an asthmatic patient.

ASTIP'ULATE,† for Stipulate.

ASTIPULA'TION,† for Stipulation.

AS'TOMOUS, a. [Gr. α without, and στομα, a mouth.] Without a mouth: applied in zool., to an order of dipterous insects; and, in bot., to an order of mosses, the capsules of which have no aperture.

ASTONE,† } v. t. [See ASTONISH.] To ASTONY,† } terrify, or astonish.

ASTONED,† } pp. Astonished.
ASTON'IED,† }

ASTON'ISH, v. t. [Old Fr. estonner, now, étonner; L. attono, to astonish; ad and tono. Sax. gestun, noise, and stunian, to stun; G. staunen; Arm. eston, wonderfully. The primary sense is, to stop, to strike dumb, to fix. See TONE and STUN.] To stun, or strike dumb with sudden fear, terror, surprise, or wonder; to amaze; to confound with some sudden passion.

I Daniel, was astonished at the vision; Dan. viii.

ASTON'ISHED, pp. Amazed; confounded with fear, surprise, or admiration.

ASTON'ISHING, ppr. Amazing; confounding with wonder, or fear.

ASTON'ISHING, a. Very wonderful; of a nature to excite great admiration, or amazement.

ASTON'ISHINGLY, adv. In a manner or degree to excite amazement.

ASTON'ISHINGNESS, n. The quality of exciting astonishment.

ASTON'ISHMENT, n. Amazement; confusion of mind from fear, surprise, or admiration, at an extraordinary, or unexpected event.

ASTOUND', v. t. To astonish; to strike dumb with amazement. From Old Fr. estonner.

ASTOUND'ED, pp. Astonished to dumbness.

ASTOUND'ING, ppr Astonishing.—2. a. Adapted to astonish.

ASTOUND'MENT, n. Amazement.

ASTRAD'DLE, adv. [a and straddle. See STRADDLE.] With the legs across a thing, or on different sides; as, to sit astraddle.

ASTRÆ'A, n. A genus of fixed polypifers, sometimes incrusting marine bodies; sometimes collected in a hemispherical or globular mass, which is sometimes, but rarely, lobated. The upper surface is covered with orbicular, or subangular starry discs, which are lamellar and sessile. Each disc is the seat of a polype, with a single row of numerous arms, in the centre of which is the mouth. The species are numerous.

AS'TRAGAL, n. [Gr. αστραγαλος, a turning joint, vertebra, spondylus.] 1. In arch., a little round moulding which surrounds the top or bottom of a column, in the form of a ring; representing a ring or band of iron, to prevent the splitting of the column. It is often cut into beads or berries, and is used in ornamented entablatures, to separate the several faces of the architrave.—2. In gunnery, a round moulding on cannon near the mouth.—3. In anat., the huckle, ancle, or sling bone; the upper bone of the foot supporting the tibia.

ASTRA'GALUS, n. A genus of leguminous plants, some of the species of which yield gum tragacanth.

AS'TRAL, a. [L. astrum; Gr. αστηρ, a star.] Belonging to the stars; starry.

AS'TRAL LAMP, n. A lamp whose light is placed under a concave glass.

ASTRAY, adv. [a and stray. See STRAY.] Out of the right way or proper place, both in a literal and figurative sense. In morals and religion, it signifies wandering from the path of rectitude, from duty and happiness.

Before I was afflicted, I went astray; Ps. cxix.

Cattle go astray when they leave their proper owners, or inclosures; see Deut. xxii.

ASTRE'A, n. [Gr. αστηρ, a star.] The goddess of justice. A name sometimes given to the sign Virgo. The poets feign that justice quitted heaven, in the golden age, to reside on earth; but becoming weary with the iniquities of men, she returned to heaven, and commenced a constellation of stars.

ASTRE'ATED, pp. Ornamented with star-like ornaments.

ASTRICT', v. t. [L. astringo, astrictus. See ASTRINGE.] To bind fast or compress. [Not mu. us.]

ASTRICT', a. Compendious; contracted.

ASTRICT'ED, pp. Bound fast; compressed with bandages.

ASTRICT'ING, ppr. Binding close; compressing; contracting.

ASTRIC'TION, n. The act of binding close, or compressing with ligatures.—2 A contraction of parts by applications; the stopping of hemorrhages. Astriction, in Scots law, is the obligation imposed by the servitude of thirlage, by which certain lands are astricted to a particular mill, and the possessors obliged to grind their grain there. [See THIRLAGE.]

ASTRICT'IVE, a Binding; compressing; styptic.

ASTRICT'ORY, a. Astringent; binding; apt to bind.

ASTRIDE, adv. With the legs across.

ASTRIF'EROUS, a. [L. astrifer; astrum, a star, and fero, to bear.] Bearing or containing stars. [Lit. us.]

ASTRIG'EROUS,† a. [Low L. astriger.] Bearing stars.

ASTRINGE, v. t. (astrinj'.) [L. astringo, of ad and stringo, to bind fast, to strain. See STRAIN.] To compress; to bind together; to contract by pressing the parts together.

ASTRING'ED, pp. Compressed; straitened; contracted.

ASTRING'ENCY, n. The power of contracting the parts of the body; that quality in medicines which binds, contracts, or strengthens parts which are relaxed; as, the astringency of acids or bitters.

ASTRING'ENT, a. Binding; contracting; strengthening; opposed to laxative. Astringent principle, that quality in medicine which binds, contracts, or strengthens. It has been called tannin, from its use in tanning hides.

ASTRING'ENT, n. A medicine which binds or contracts the parts of the body to which it is applied, restrains profuse discharges, coagulates animal fluids, condenses and strengthens the solids. The principal astringents are the mineral acids, alum, lime-water, chalk, certain preparations of copper, zinc, iron, and lead, catechu, kino, oak, bark, and galls. Modern practice inclines to the use of astringent for internal applications, and styptic for external.

ASTRING'ER n. A falconer that keeps a goshawk.

ASTRING'ING, ppr. Compressing; binding fast; contracting.

AS'TRITE, n. [Gr. αστης, a star; Fr. astroite.] An extraneous fossil, called also asteria and astroit. Astrites are stones in the form of small, short, angular, or sulcated columns, about an inch and a half long, and the third of an inch in diameter, composed of several regular joints, which, when separated, resemble a radiated star. Astrites are said to be detached articulations of encrinites, a kind of marine polype.

ASTROG'NOSIA, n. [Gr. αστης, a star, and γνωσις, knowledge.] The art of knowing the fixed stars, their names, ranks, situations, and the like.

ASTROG'RAPHY, n. [Gr. αστης, or αστρον, a star, and γραφω, to describe.] A description of the stars, or the science of describing them.

AS'TROID, n. In her., a star consisting of six points or more, in distinction from a mullet, consisting only of five.

AS'TROIT, n. Star-stone. [See ASTRITE.]—2. A species of petrified madrepore often found in calcareous stones.

AS'TROLABE, n. [Gr. αστης, a star, and λαβειν, to take.] 1. An instrument formerly used for taking the altitude of the sun or stars at sea.—2. A stereographic projection of the sphere, either upon the plane of the equator, the eye being supposed to be in the pole of the world; or upon the plane of the meridian, the eye being in the point of intersection of the equinoctial and the horizon.—3. Among the ancients, the same as the modern armillary sphere.

ASTROL'ATRY, n. [Gr. αστης, and λατρεια, worship.] The worship of the stars.

ASTROL'OGER, ASTROLO'GIAN, n. [L. astrologus, of αστρον, a star, and λογος, discourse.] 1. One who professes to foretell future events by the aspects and situation of the stars. Astrologian is little used.—2. Formerly one who understood the motions of the planets, without predicting.

ASTROLOG'IC, ASTROLOG'ICAL, a. Pertaining to astrology; professing or practising astrology.

ASTROLOG'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of astrology.

ASTROL'OGIZE, v. i. To practise astrology.

ASTROL'OGY, n. [Supra.] A science which teaches to judge of the effects and influences of the stars, and to foretell future events by their situation and different aspects.—Natural astrology, that branch of astrology which professed to predict natural effects, as changes of the weather, winds, storms, &c.—Judicial astrology, that branch which pretended to foretell moral events, such as have a dependence on the free will and agency of man; as if they were produced or directed by the stars. This science was formerly in great request, as men ignorantly supposed the heavenly bodies to have a ruling influence over the physical and moral world; but it is now universally exploded by true science and philosophy.

ASTROMETEOROL'OGY, [Gr. αστρον, a star, μετρον, measure, and λογος, discourse.] The art of foretelling the weather and its changes, from the aspect of the moon and stars.

ASTRON'OMER, n. One who is versed in astronomy; one who has a knowledge of the laws of the heavenly orbs, or the principles by which their motions are regulated, with their various phenomena.

ASTRONOM'IC, ASTRONOM'ICAL, a. Pertaining to astronomy.—Astronomical place of a star, or planet, is its longitude or place in the ecliptic, reckoned from the beginning of Aries, according to the order of the signs.—Astronomical observations, such observations as are made with suitable instruments, by astronomers, on the heavenly bodies, to ascertain their forms, appearances, motions, &c.—Astronomical tables, computations of the motions, places, and other phenomena of the planets. The Nautical Almanac consists of such tables.—Astronomical calendar, an instrument which shows at sight the meridian altitude, and declination of the sun.—Astronomical sector, an instrument for finding the difference in right ascension and declination between two objects, whose distance is too great to be seen through a fixed telescope.—Astronomical year. See YEAR.

ASTRONOM'ICALLY, adv. In an astronomical manner; by the principles of astronomy.

ASTRON'OMIZE, v. i. To study astronomy. [Lit. us.]

ASTRON'OMY, n. [Gr. αστρον, a star, and νομος, a law, or rule.] The science which teaches the knowledge of the celestial bodies, their magnitudes, motions, distances, periods of revolution, aspects, eclipses, order, &c. This science depends on observations, made chiefly with instruments, and upon mathematical calculations. That part of the science which gives a description of the motions, figures, periods of revolution, and other phenomena of the heavenly bodies is called descriptive astronomy; that part which determines the motions, figures, periodical revolutions, distances, &c. of the heavenly bodies, is called practical astronomy; and that part which explains the causes of their motions, and demonstrates the laws by which those causes operate, is termed physical astronomy.

AS'TROSCOPE, n. [Gr. αστρον, a star, and σκοπεω, to view.] An astronomical instrument, composed of two cones, on whose surface the constellations, with their stars, are delineated, by means of which the stars may be easily known.

AS'TROSCOPY, n. [See ASTROSCOPE.] Observation of the stars.

ASTROTHEM'ATA, n. plu. [Gr. αστρον, a star, and θεμα, a thing laid down.] The places or positions of the stars in an astrological scheme of the heavens.

ASTRO-THEOL'OGY, n. [L. astrum, a star, and theologia, divinity.] Theology founded on the observation of the celestial bodies.

ASTRUT', adv. [See STRUT.] In a strutting manner.

AS'TUR, n. In zool., a genus of hawks formed by Bechsteiff, and characterised by a short beak bent downwards from the base, and convex above, with some-what oval nostrils.

ASTUTE', a. [L. astutus, from astus, craft, subtility; Ir. aisde, aiste, ingenuity.] Shrewd; sharp; eagle-eyed; critically examining, or discerning.

ASTUTE'NESS, n. Shrewdness; cunning.

AS'TY, n. [Gr. αστυ.] In the history of arch., a town or city. The name of that part of Athens which encircled the acropolis.

ASUND'ER, adv. [Sax. asundrian, to divide. See SUNDER.] Apart; into parts; separately; in a divided state.

The Lord hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked; Ps cxxix.

ASWOON',† adv. In a swoon.

ASY'LUM, n. [L. from Gr. ασυλον, safe from spoil, α and συλη, spoil, συλαω, to plunder.] 1. A sanctuary, or place of refuge, where criminals and debtors shelter themselves from justice, and from which they cannot be taken without sacrilege. Temples and altars were anciently asylums; as were tombs, statues, and monuments. The ancient heathens allowed asylums for the protection of the vilest criminals; and the Jews had their cities of refuge.—2. Any place of retreat and security.

ASYM'METRAL, ASYMMET'RICAL, a. [See SYMMETRY.] Not having symmetry. [Lit. us.]

ASYM'METRY, n. [Gr. α priv. and συμμετρια, symmetry, of συν, with, and μετρεω, to measure.] The want of proportion between the parts of a thing. It is also used in mathematics for incommensurability, when between two quantities there is no common measure.

AS'YMPTOTE, n. [Gr α priv. and συν, with, and πτοω, to fall; not meeting or coinciding.] A line which approaches nearer and nearer to some curve, but though infinitely extended, would never meet it. This may be conceived as a tangent to a curve at an infinite distance.

ASYMPTOT'ICAL, a. Belonging to an asymptote. Asymptotical lines, or curves, are such as continually approach when extended, but never meet.

ASYN'DETON, n. [Gr. α priv. and συνδεω, to bind together.] In gram., a figure which omits the connective; as, veni, vidi, vici. It stands opposed to polysyndeton, which is a multiplication of connectives.

AT, prep. [Sax. æt; Goth. at; L. ad. At, ad, and to, if not radically the same word, often coincide in signification. In W. at is to, and in Danish, it is the sign of the infinitive mood; in Amh. od, or ud, is toward. The word at is doubtless the oriental אתא, אתה, atha, atheh, Ch. and Heb. to come, to approach. Hence it primarily denotes presence, meeting, nearness, direction toward.] In general, at denotes nearness or presence; as, at the ninth hour, at the house; but it is less definite than in or on; at the house, may be in or near the house. It denotes also toward, versus; as, to aim an arrow at a mark From this original import are derived all the various uses of at. At the sight, is with, present, or coming the sight; at this news, present the news, on or with the approach or arrival of this news. At peace, at war, in a state of peace or war existing, being present; at ease, at play, at a loss, &c. convey the like idea. At arms, furnished with arms, bearing arms, present with arms; at hand, within reach of the hand, and therefore near; at my cost, with my cost; at his suit, by or with his suit; at this declaration, he rose from his seat, that is, present, or coming this declaration; whence results the idea in consequence of it. At his command, is either under his command, that is, literally, coming or being come his command, in the power of, or in consequence of it. He is good at engraving, at husbandry; that is, in performing that business. He deserves well at our hands, that is, from us. The peculiar phrases in which this word occurs, with appropriate significations, are numerous. At first, at last, at least, at best, at the worst, at the highest or lowest, are phrases in which some noun is implied; as, at the first time or beginning; at the last time, or point of time; at the least or best degree, &c.; all denoting an extreme point or superlative degree. At all, is in any manner or degree.—At is sometimes used for to, or toward, noting progression or direction; as, he aims at perfection; he makes or runs at him, or points at him. In this phrase, he longs to be at him, at has its general sense of approaching, or present, or with, in contest or attack.

AT'ABAL, n. [Sp.] A kettle drum; a kind of tabor.

ATAC'AMITE, n. A muriate of copper.

AT'AGAS, n. The red cock, or moor game.

ATAMAS'CO, n. A species of the genus Amaryllis.

AT'ARAXY, n. [Gr. ἀταραχος, of α priv. and ταραχη, tumult.] Calmness of mind; a term used by the stoics and sceptics to denote a freedom from the emotions which proceed from vanity and self-conceit.

ATAX'Y, n. [Gr. α priv. and ταξις, order.] Want of order; disturbance; irregularity in the functions of the body or in the crisis and paroxysms of disease.

ATCHE, n. In Turkey, a small silver coin, value about three farthings.

ATE, the preterit of eat; which see.

A'TE, n. (a'ty.) [Gr. ατη, mischief; αταω, to hurt. Ate is a personification of evil, mischief, or malice.] In pagan mytho., the goddess of mischief, who was cast down from heaven by Jupiter.

-ATE, [Termin. from the Lat. terminatus.] The termination -ate in adjectives is equivalent to our own termination in -ed; we also form verbs upon this adjective or past participle; thus to animate, from which by suffixing ed, we obtain a new participle giving more energy, as, animate, animated; from this source we also obtain some nouns, as reprobate. Our nouns in -ation, are immediately from the Latin and are equivalent to our termination in -ing They denote action, the means, the effect of action. Ate in chem, is a termination affixed to a compound of any acid, containing a maximum of oxygen with an alkaline, earthy, or metallic base, such as nitr*ate*, sulph*ate*, carbon*ate*, &c. &c. The termination in ite, indicates a lower degree of acidification than a maximum. [See ITE.]

AT'ELENE, a. [Gr. ατελης, imperfect.] In mineral., imperfect; wanting regular forms in the genus.

ATE'LES, n. In zool, a genus of sapajous, or American monkeys. They have long, attenuated and powerfully prehensile tails, and their forehands are either entirely deprived of thumbs, or have only a very small rudiment of that organ.

ATELES'TITE, n. A mineral, crystalline in structure, resembling sphene.

ATEL'LAN, a. Relating to the dramas at Atella, in Italy.

ATEL'LAN, n. A dramatic representation, satirical or licentious.

A TEMP'O GIUS'TO. [It.; L. in tempore justo.] A direction in music, which signifies to sing or play in an equal, true, or just time. It is seldom used but when the time has been interrupted.

ATHANA'SIAN, a. Pertaining to Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century. The Athanasian creed is a formulary, confession or exposition of faith, supposed formerly to have been drawn up by Athanasius, but this opinion is now rejected, and the composition is ascribed by some to Hilary, bishop of Arles. It is a summary of what was called the orthodox faith.

ATH'ANOR, n. [Ar. and Heb. תנור, thanor, an oven or furnace.] A digesting furnace, formerly used in chemical operations; so constructed as to maintain a uniform and durable heat. It is a furnace, with a lateral tower close on all sides, which is to be filled with fuel. As the fuel below is consumed, that in the tower falls down to supply its place.

A'THEISM, n. The disbelief of the existence of a God, or Supreme intelligent Being.

> Atheism is a ferocious system, that leaves nothing above us to excite awe, nor around us to awaken tenderness. Rob. Hall.

A'THEIST, n. [Gr. αθεος, of α priv. and θεος, God.] One who disbelieves the existence of a God, or Supreme intelligent Being.

A'THEIST, a. Atheistical; disbelieving or denying the being of a Supreme God.

ATHEIST'IC, } a. Pertaining to ATHEIST'ICAL, } atheism.—2. Disbelieving the existence of a God; impious; applied to persons; as, an atheistic writer.—3. Implying or containing atheism; applied to things; as, atheistic doctrines or opinions.

ATHEIST'ICALLY, adv. In an atheistic manner; impiously.

ATHEIST'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being atheistical.

A'THEIZE,† v. i. To discourse as an atheist.

ATHEL, ADEL or ÆTHEL, noble, of illustrious birth; Sax. ædel, æthel; Ar. athala, to be well-rooted, to be of noble origin. This word is found in many Saxon names; as, in Atheling, a noble youth; Ethelred, noble counsel; Ethelard, noble genius; Ethelbert, nobly bright, eminently noble. Ethelwald, noble government, or power; Ethelward, noble defender.

ATHENÆ'UM, } n. [L. from Gr. Αθηναιον,
ATHENE'UM, } or Αθηναια, Minerva, the goddess of wisdom.] In ancient times, a public building erected for rehearsals and lectures, the chief of which was at Athens. In modern times, the name Athenæum, has frequently been given to establishments connected with literature and art, to reading-rooms where periodicals and newspapers are kept, and also to public libraries frequented for the purpose of reading.

ATHE'NIAN, a. [from Athens.] Pertaining to Athens, the metropolis of Attica in Greece.

ATHE'NIAN, n. A native or inhabitant of Athens.

ATHEOLO'GIAN, n. One who is opposed to a theologian.

ATHEOL'OGY,† n. Atheism.

A'THEOUS,† a. Atheistic; impious.

ATH'ERINE, } n. A genus of fishes of ATHERI'NA, } the Abdominal order. The characters are, the upper jaw is rather flat, the rays of the gill membrane are six, and the side belt or line shines like silver. There are four species; the best known is the Hepsetus, very abundant in the Mediterranean, where it is caught in large quantities.

ATHERO'MA, n. [Gr. from αθηρα, pap.] A species of wen or encysted tumour, whose contents are curdy.

ATHERO'MATOUS, a. Pertaining to or resembling an atheroma; having the qualities of an atheroma.

ATHIRST', a. (athurst'.) [a and thirst. See THIRST.] 1. Thirsty; wanting drink.—2. Having a keen appetite or desire.

> He had a soul athirst for knowledge. Ch. Observer.

ATHLETE, n. [See ATHLETIC.] A contender for victory.

ATHLET'IC, a. [Gr. αθλητης: L. athleta, a wrestler; from αεθλος, strife, contest.] 1. Belonging to wrestling, boxing, running, and other exercises and sports, which were practised by the ancients, usually called the athletic games. Hence,—2. Strong; lusty; robust; vigorous. An athletic body or constitution, is one fitted for vigorous exertions.

ATHWART', prep. [a and thwart. See THWART.] 1. Across; from side to side; transverse; as, athwart the path —2. In mar. language, across the line of a ship's course, as, a fleet standing athwart our course—Athwart hause, is the situation of a ship when she lies across the stem of another, whether near, or at some distance.—Athwart the fore foot, is a phrase applied to the flight of a cannon ball, across another ship's course, ahead, as a signal for her to bring to.—Athwart ships, reaching across the ship from side to side, or in that direction.

ATHWART', adv. In a manner to cross and perplex; crossly; wrong; wrongfully.

ATILT', adv [a and tilt. See TILT.] 1. In the manner of a tilter; in the position, or with the action, of a man making a thrust; as, to stand or run atilt. - 2. In the manner of a cask tilted, or with one end raised.

AT'IMY, n. [Gr. ατιμια, α and τιμη, honour.] In ancient Greece, disgrace; exclusion from office or magistracy, by some disqualifying act or decree.

ATLAN'TIAN, } a. Pertaining to the ATLANTE'AN, } isle Atlantis, which the ancients allege was sunk and overwhelmed by the ocean.—2. Pertaining to Atlas; resembling Atlas.

ATLAN'TES, n plur. [Gr. ατλαντες.]

Atlantes, in the Baths, Pompeii.

In arch., a term applied to figures or half figures of men, used in the place of columns or pilasters, to support an entablature. They are also called Telamones.

ATLAN'TIC, a. [from Atlas or Atlantis] Pertaining to that division of the ocean, which lies between Europe and Africa on the east, and America on the west.

ATLAN'TIC, n. The ocean, or that part of the general sea bounded by Europe and Africa on the east, and America on the west.

ATLAN'TICA, ATLAN'TIS, } n. An isle mentioned by the ancients, situated west of Gades, or Cadiz, on the strait of Gibraltar. The poets mention two isles, and call them Hesperides, western isles, and Elysian fields. Authors are not agreed whether these isles were the Canaries, or some other isles, or the continent of America.

ATLAN'TIDES, n. A name given to the Pleiades or seven stars, which were feigned to be the daughters of Atlas, a king of Mauritania, or of his brother, Hesperus, who were translated to heaven.

ATLAN'TIS, n. A fictitious philosophical commonwealth of Lord Bacon, or the piece describing it; composed in the manner of More's Utopia, and Campanella's City of the Sun. One part of the work is finished, in which the author has described a college, founded for the study of nature, under the name of Solomon's House. The model of a commonwealth was never executed.

AT'LAS, n. A collection of maps in a volume; supposed to be so called from a picture of mount Atlas, supporting the heavens, prefixed to some collection.—2. A large square folio, resembling a volume of maps.—3. The supporters of a building.—4. A silk, satin, or stuff, manufactured in the East, with admirable ingenuity. Atlases are plain, striped, or flowered; but they have not the fine gloss and lustre of some French silks.—5. The first vertebra of the neck.—6. A term applied to paper, as atlas fine.

ATMOM'ETER, n. [Gr. ατμος, vapour, and μετρεω, to measure.] An instrument to measure the quantity of exhalation from a humid surface in a given time; an evaporometer. It consists of a thin hollow ball of porous earthenware, in which is inserted a tube of glass with divisions. The cavity of the ball and the tube are filled with water, and the top of the tube closed. In this state, the instrument is exposed to the free action of the air, when the water transudes through the porous substance, and is evaporated by the air. It was invented by Sir John Leslie.

AT'MOSPHERE, n. [Gr. ατμος, vapour, and σφαιρα, a sphere.] The whole mass of fluid, consisting of air, aqueous and other vapours, surrounding the earth, and supposed to extend to the height of between forty and fifty miles above the surface of the earth. Its greatest density is at the earth's surface, and the density decreases in a geometrical progression, while the heights increase in an arithmetical progression. The atmosphere, like other bodies, gravitates toward the earth, and therefore has weight and pressure. The weight at an average, at the level of the sea, is found to be about fifteen pounds on the square inch. If air be condensed so as to exert a pressure of thirty pounds on the square inch, the pressure is said to be two atmospheres, a condensation which gives forty-five pounds, is termed three atmospheres, and so on. Pressures arising from other causes, such as the weight of liquids, and the force of steam, are also frequently counted by atmospheres. Electrical atmosphere; that sphere which surrounds the surface of electrified bodies, and which consists of electrical effluvia issuing from them. Magnetic atmosphere; the sphere within which the virtue of the magnet acts.

ATMOSPHER'IC, ATMOSPHER'ICAL, } a. Pertaining to the atmosphere; as, atmospheric air or vapours. —Atmospheric air, a term formerly employed to distinguish common air from vital air, now called oxygen, and inflammable air, now called hydrogen.—Atmospherical clock, a machine for measuring the mean temperature of the air, which was proposed by Sir D. Brewster.—2. Dependent on the atmosphere.

> I am an atmospheric creature. Pope.

ATMOSPHER'IC TIDES, n. Certain changes in the barometric pressure of the atmosphere, depending on the attraction of the sun and moon.

AT'OM, n. [Gr. ατομος: L. atomus; from α, not, and τεμνω, to cut.] 1. A particle of matter so minute as to admit of no division. Atoms are conceived to be the first principles or component parts of all bodies.—2. The ultimate or smallest component part of a body.—3. Any thing extremely small.

ATOM'IC, ATOM'ICAL, } a. Pertaining to atoms; consisting of atoms; extremely minute. The atomical philosophy, said to be broached by Moschus, before the Trojan war, and cultivated by Epicurus, teaches that atoms are endued with gravity and motion, by which all things were formed, without the aid of a Supreme intelligent Being. The atomic theory, in chem., or the doctrine of definite proportions, teaches that all chemical combinations take place between the ultimate particles or atoms of bodies, and that these unite either atom with atom, or in proportions expressed by some simple multiple of the number of atoms.

ATOM'IC WEIGHTS, n. The numbers expressing the proportions in which bodies unite, must likewise, according to the atomic theory, in chemistry, indicate the relative weights of atoms, and accordingly these numbers are often called atomic weights.

AT'OMISM, n. The doctrine of atoms.

AT'OMIST, n. One who holds to the atomical philosophy.

AT'OMIZE, v. t. To reduce to atoms.

AT'OM-LIKE, a. Resembling atoms.

ATOMOL'OGY, n. The doctrine of atoms.

AT'OMY, n. A word used by Shakspeare for atom; also, an abbreviation of anatomy.

ATONE, adv. [at and one] At one; together.

ATONE, v. i. [Supposed to be compounded of at and one. The Spanish has adunar, to unite or join, and the Ital. adunare, to assemble; from L. ad and unus, unio. In Welsh, dyun, signifies united, accordant, agreeing; dyunaw, to unite, or agree; from un, one and dy, a prefix denoting iteration] 1.† To agree; to be in accordance; to accord.

> He and Aufidius can no more atone,
> Than violentest contrariety. Shak.

2. To stand as an equivalent; to make reparation, amends, or satisfaction for an offence, or a crime, by which reconciliation is procured between the offended and offending parties.

> The murderer fell, and blood atoned for blood. Pope.
> By what propitiation shall I atone for my former gravity? Rambler, No. 10.
>
> The life of a slave was deemed to be of so little value, that a very slight compensation atoned for taking it away Robertson, Charles V.

3. To atone for, to make compensation or amends.

> This evil was atoned for by the good effects of the study of the practical physics of Aristotle. Schlegel, Trans.
> The ministry not atoning for their former conduct by any wise or popular measure. Junius.

ATONE, v. t. To expiate; to answer or make satisfaction for.

> Or each atone his guilty love with life. Pope.

2.† To reduce to concord; to reconcile, as parties at variance; to appease.

ATONED, pp. Expiated; appeased; reconciled.

ATONEMENT, n. Agreement; concord; reconciliation, after enmity or controversy, Rom. v.

> He seeks to make atonement
> Between the Duke of Glo'ster and your brothers. Shak.

2. Expiation; satisfaction, or reparation made by giving an equivalent for an injury, or by doing or suffering that which is received in satisfaction for an offence or injury; with for.

> And Moses said to Aaron, Go to the altar and offer thy sin-offering, and thy burnt-offering, and make an atonement for thyself, and for the people; Lev. ix.
> When a man has been guilty of any vice, the best atonement he can make for it is, to warn others not to fall into the like. Spectator, No. 8.
> The Phocians behaved with so much gallantry, that they were thought to have made a sufficient atonement for their former offence. Potter, Antiq.

3 In theol., the expiation of sin made by the obedience and personal sufferings of Christ.

ATONER, n. He who makes atonement.

ATON'IC, a. Debilitated.

ATONING, ppr. Reconciling.—2. Making amends, or satisfaction.

AT'ONY, n. [Gr. ατονια, defect, of α priv. and τονος, tone, from τεινω, to stretch.] Debility; a want of tone; defect of muscular power; palsy.

ATOP', adv. [a and top. See TOP.] On or at the top.

ATRABILA'RIAN, ATRABILA'RIOUS, } a. [L. atra bilis, black bile.] Affected with melancholy, which the ancients attributed to the bile; replete with black bile.

ATRABILA'RIOUSNESS, n. The state of being melancholy, or affected with disordered bile.

ATRAMENTA'RIOUS, a. Like ink; suitable for making ink. The sulphate of iron, or green copperas, is called atramentarious, as being the material of ink.

ATRIP', adv. [a and trip. See TRIP.] In naut. language, the anchor is atrip, when drawn out of the ground in a perpendicular direction. The topsails are atrip, when they are hoisted to the top of the mast, or as high as possible.

AT'RIUM, n. [Lat.] In ancient domestic arch., a court-yard, or portal open to the air, in the front of a dwelling. It was a species of covered portico, composed of two rows of columns, which formed two narrow isles and a wide centre. It was the most important, and usually the most splendid apartment of a Roman house. It was roofed over, except an opening in the centre, called compluvium, towards which the roof sloped, so as to throw the rain water into a cistern in the floor, called impluvium.

ATRO'CIOUS, a. [L. atrox, trux, fierce, cruel.] 1. Extremely heinous, criminal, or cruel; enormous; outrageous; as, atrocious guilt or offence.—2.† Very grievous; violent; as, atrocious distempers.

ATRO'CIOUSLY, adv. In an atrocious manner; with enormous cruelty or guilt.

ATRO'CIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being enormously criminal, or cruel.

ATRO'CITY, n. Enormous wickedness; extreme heinousness, or cruelty; as, the atrocity of murder.

AT'ROPA, n. [Gr. Ατροπος.] The name of a genus of poisonous narcotic plants, belonging to the class Pentandria, and order Monogynia, and nat. order Solanaceæ. The atropa belladonna, or deadly nightshade is a species. It has the property of dilating the pupil of the eye.

AT'ROPHY, n. [Gr. α priv. and τρεφω, to nourish.] A consumption or wasting of the flesh, with loss of strength, without any sensible cause; a wasting from defect of nourishment.

ATROP'INA, } sometimes called A-
AT'ROPINE, } TRO'PIA, n. A vegetable alkaloid, extracted from the Atropa Belladonna, or deadly nightshade. It is white, brilliant, and crystallizes in long needles.

A'TROUS, a. [L. ater.] Intensely black.

ATTACH', v. t. [Fr. attacher, to tie, or fasten, to apply, to engage, to stick. It seems to be allied to attack, and the sense is, to put, throw, or fall on, hence, to seize and stop, coinciding with the Eng. take; Sax. tæccan; Gr. δεχομαι; L. tango, for tago; Eng. tack; &c. See ATTACK, and TACK.] 1. To take by legal authority; to arrest the person by writ; to answer for a debt; applied to a taking of the person by a civil process; being never used for the arrest of a criminal. It is applied also to the taking of goods and real estate by an officer, by virtue of a writ or precept, to hold the same to satisfy a judgment to be rendered in the suit.—2. To take, seize, and lay hold on, by moral force, as by affection, or interest: to win the heart; to fasten, or bind by moral influence; as, attached to a friend; attaching others to us by wealth or flattery.—3. To make to adhere; to tie, bind, or fasten; as, to attach substances by any glutinous matter; to attach one thing to another by a string.

ATTACH'ABLE, a. That may be legally attached; liable to be taken by writ or precept.

ATTACHE', n. (attasha.) [Fr.] One attached to another, as a part of his suite or attendants.

ATTACH'ED, pp. Taken by writ or precept; drawn to and fixed, or united by affection, or interest.

ATTACH'ING, ppr. Taking or seizing by commandment or writ; drawing to, and fixing by influence; winning the affections.

ATTACH'MENT, n. A taking of the person, goods, or estate, by a writ or precept in a civil action, to secure a debt or demand.—2. A writ directing the person or estate of a person to be taken, to secure his appearance before a court. In England, the first notice to appear in court is by summons; and if the defendant disobeys this monition, a writ of attachment issues, commanding the sheriff to attach him, by taking gage, or security in goods, which he forfeits by non-appearance, or by making him find safe pledges or sureties for his appearance. But in trespasses, an attachment is the first process. In the United States, attachment is more generally the first process, and in some states, the writ of attachment issues at first against the property or person of the defendant In Connecticut, this writ issues against the person, goods, or land, in the first instance, commanding to take the goods and estate of the defendant, if to be found; or otherwise, to take his body. In England, witnesses not appearing upon a summons, may be taken by attachment. Attachments also issue against persons for contempt of court. The court of attachments, in England, was held before the verderors of the forest, to attach and try offenders against vert and venison. Foreign attachment, is the taking of the money or goods of a debtor in the hands of a stranger; as, when the debtor is not within the jurisdiction of the court, or has absconded. Any person who has goods or effects of a debtor, is considered in law as the agent, attorney, factor, or trustee of the debtor; and an attachment served on such person binds the property in his hands to respond the judgment against the debtor.—3. Close adherence or affection; fidelity; regard; any passion or affection that binds a person; as, an attachment to a friend, or to a party.

ATTACK', v. t. [Fr. attaquer; It. attaccare, to fasten, to engage in battle; attacco, a sticking; Sp. atacar, to assault, to fasten, or make close, to cram; Port. atacar, to attack, to seize, to fasten; Heb. and Ch. תקע, thaco, to thrust, to drive, to strike. It seems to be allied to attach; but the latter verb agrees better with the Eth. tok, took, to press, whence atook, to press, to make close; and the Ch. תכך, tech, to accuse, to unite.] 1. To assault; to fall upon with force; to assail, as with force and arms. It is the appropriate word for the commencing act of hostility between armies and navies.—2. To fall upon, with unfriendly words, or writing; to begin a controversy with; to attempt to overthrow or bring into disrepute, by satire, calumny, or criticism; as, to attack a man or his opinions in a pamphlet.

ATTACK', n. An onset; first invasion; a falling on, with force or violence, or with calumny, satire, or criticism.

ATTACK'ABLE, a. That can be attacked; assailable.

ATTACK'ED, pp. Assaulted; invaded; fallen on by force or enmity.

ATTACK'ER, n. One who assaults or invades.

ATTACK'ING, ppr. Assaulting; invading; falling on with force, calumny, or criticism.

ATTACOT'TIC, a. Pertaining to the Attacotti, a tribe of ancient Britons, allies of the Scots.

AT'TAGEN, n. A beautiful fowl, resembling the pheasant, with a short black bill and a fine crest of yellow feathers, variegated with black and white spots, found in the mountains of Sicily.

AT'TAGHAN, n. A weapon like a sword, used by the Turks.

ATTĀIN, v. i. [Fr. and Norm. atteindre; L. attingo, to reach, come to, or overtake; ad and tango, to touch, reach, or strike; that is, to thrust, urge, or push to. It has no connection with L. attineo.] 1. To reach; to come to, or arrive at, by motion, bodily exertion, or efforts toward a place or object.

If by any means they might attain to Phenice; Acts xxvii.

2. To reach; to come to, or arrive at, by an effort of mind.

Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I can not attain to it; Ps. cxxxix

Regularly this verb should be always followed by to; the omission of to, and the use of the verb, in a transitive sense, may have originated in mistake, from the opinion that the verb is from the L. attineo, and equivalent to obtain.

ATTĀIN, v. t. To gain; to compass; to achieve, or accomplish, that is, to reach by efforts; without to following.

Is he wise who hopes to attain the end without the means? Tillotson.

This use of the verb is now established; but in strictness to is here implied; attain to the end. The real sense, as in the intransitive use of the verb, is to reach or come to the end or purpose in view. This word always implies an effort toward an object. Hence it is not synonymous with obtain and procure, which do not necessarily imply such effort. We procure or obtain a thing by purchase or loan, and we obtain by inheritance, but we do not attain it by such means. An inattention to this distinction has led good authors into great mistakes in the use of this word.—2. To reach, or come to a place or object by progression or motion.

But ere such tidings shall his ears attain. Hoole's Tasso.

Canaan he now attains. Milton.

3. To reach in excellence or degree; to equal.

ATTĀINABIL'ITY, n. Attainableness.

ATTĀINABLE, a. That may be attained; that may be reached by efforts of the mind or body; that may be compassed or accomplished by efforts directed to the object; as, perfection is not attainable in this life. From an inattention to the true sense of this word, as explained under Attain, authors have very improperly used this word for obtainable, procurable; as in the following passages: "The kind and quality of food and liquor; the species of habitation, furniture, and clothing, to which the common people of each country are habituated, must be attainable with ease and certainty." Paley, Phil. b. vi. ch. 11. "Gen. Howe would not permit them to be purchased in Philadelphia, and they (clothes and blankets) were not attainable in the country." Marshall's Life of Washington, 3, 428. Each of these words should be obtainable.

ATTĀINABLENESS, n. The quality of being attainable.

ATTĀINDER, n. [Norm. Fr. atteindre, to corrupt, attaint; also, conviction; L. ad and tingo, to stain; Gr. τεγγω. See TINGE.] 1. Literally a staining, corruption, or rendering impure; a corruption of blood. Hence,—2. The judgment of death, or sentence of a competent tribunal upon a person convicted of treason, or felony, which judgment attaints, taints or corrupts his blood, so that he can no longer inherit lands. The consequences of this judgment are, forfeiture of lands, tenements and hereditaments, loss of reputation, and disqualification to be a witness in any court of law. A statute of Parliament attainting a criminal, is called an act of attainder.

Upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt by legal attainder, the feudal covenant is broken. Blackstone.

3. The act of attainting.

An act was made for the attainder of several persons. Encyc.

ATTĀINED, pp. Reached, achieved.

ATTĀINING, ppr. Reaching, arriving at, accomplishing.

ATTĀINMENT, n. The act of attaining; the act of arriving at, or reaching; hence, the act of obtaining by efforts; as, the attainment of excellence.—2. That which is attained to, or obtained by exertion; acquisition; as, a man of great attainments.

ATTĀINT, v. t. [See ATTAINDER.] 1. To taint or corrupt: to extinguish the pure or inheritable blood of a person found guilty of treason, or felony, by confession, battle, or verdict, and consequent sentence of death, or by special act of Parliament.

No person shall be attainted of high treason, where corruption of blood is incurred, but by the oath of two witnesses, &c. Stat. 7 and 8 Will III.

2. To taint, as the credit of jurors, convicted of giving a false verdict. This is done by special writ of attaint. The conviction of such a crime attaints the reputation of jurors, and renders them infamous.—3. To disgrace; to cloud with infamy; to stain.—4. To taint, or corrupt.

ATTĀINT, n. A stain, spot, or taint. [See TAINT.]—2.† Any thing injurious; that which impairs.—3. A blow, or wound on the hinder feet of a horse.—4. A writ which lies after judgment against a jury, for giving a false verdict in any court of record.

ATTĀINTED, pp. Stained; corrupted; rendered infamous; rendered incapable of inheriting.

ATTĀINTING, ppr. Staining; corrupting; rendering infamous by judicial act; depriving of inheritable blood.

ATTĀINTMENT, n. The being attainted.

ATTĀINTURE, n. A staining or rendering infamous; reproach; imputation.

ATTALE'A, n. A genus of plants, found chiefly in the tropical parts of America. It belongs to the same division of the natural system as the cocoa-nut, viz. to the palm tribe; but it is distinguished by its nut containing three cells, and three seeds. Its fruit is eaten by the negroes, and its leaves form an excellent thatch, and are woven into hats, mats, and baskets

ATT'AR, or OTTO OF ROSES, n. An essential oil made in various eastern countries, and in Egypt, from Rosa, Moschata, and Damascena. 100,000 roses yield only 180 grains of attar. The oil is at first greenish, but afterwards it presents various tints of green, yellow, and red. In this country, it is concrete at all ordinary temperatures, and becomes liquid about 84° Fah. This oil is a well known perfume, but the odour is agreeable only when diffused, being too powerful when it is concentrated.

ATTĂSK',† v. t. To task; to tax. [See TASK.]

ATTĂSTE,† v. t. To taste. [See TASTE.]

ATTEM'PER, v. t. [L. attempero, of ad and tempero, to temper, mix, or moderate. See TEMPER.] 1. To reduce, modify, or moderate by mixture; as, to attemper heat by a cooling mixture, or spirit by diluting it with water.—2. To soften, mollify, or moderate; as, to attemper rigid justice with clemency.—3. To mix in just proportion; to regulate; as, a mind well attempered with kindness and justice.—4. To accommodate; to fit or make suitable.

Arts attempered to the lyre. Pope.

ATTEM'PERANCE,† n. Temperance.

ATTEM'PERATE, a. [L. attemperatus.] Tempered; proportioned; suited.

Hope must be proportioned and attemperate to the promise. Hammond.

ATTEM'PERATE,† v. t. To attemper.

ATTEM'PERED, pp. Reduced in quality; moderated; softened; well mixed; suited.

ATTEM'PERING, ppr. Moderating in quality; softening; mixing in due proportion; making suitable.

ATTEM'PERLY,† adv In a temperate manner.

ATTEM'PERMENT, n A tempering or due proportion.

ATTEMPT', v. t. [Fr. attenter, from L. attento, to attempt, of ad and tento, to try; Arm. attempti. The L. tento is from the same root as tendo, to strain; Gr. τείνω. Hence, the literal sense is to strain, urge, stretch.] 1. To make an effort to effect some object; to make trial or experiment; to try; to endeavour; to use exertion for any purpose; as, to attempt to sing; to attempt a bold flight. 2. To attack; to make an effort upon; as, to attempt the enemy's camp. This verb is not always followed by an object, and appears to be intransitive; but some object is understood, or a verb in the infinitive follows in the place of an object; as, he attempted to speak.

ATTEMPT', n An essay; trial or endeavour; an attack; or an effort to gain a point.

ATTEMPT'ABLE, a. That may be attempted, tried, or attacked; liable to an attempt, or attack.

ATTEMPT'ED, pp. Essayed; tried; attacked.

ATTEMPT'ER, n. One who attempts, or attacks.

ATTEMPT'ING, ppr. Trying; essaying; making an effort to gain a point; attacking.

ATTEND', v. t. [L. attendo; Fr. attendre, to wait, stay, hold, expect; L. ad and tendo, to stretch, to tend. See TEND.] 1. To go with, or accompany, as a companion, minister, or servant.—2. To be present; to accompany or be united to; as, a cold attended with fever.—3. To be present for some duty, implying charge or oversight; to wait on; as, the physician or the nurse attends the sick.—4. To be present in business; to be in company from curiosity, or from some connection in affairs; as, lawyers or spectators attend a court.—5. To be consequent to, from connection of cause; as, a measure attended with ill effects.—6. To await; to remain, abide or be in store for; as, happiness or misery attends us after death.—7. To wait for; to lie in wait.—8. To wait or stay for.

Three days I promised to attend my doom. Dryden.

9. To accompany with solicitude; to regard.

Their hunger thus appeased, their care attends
The doubtful fortune of their absent friends. Dryden.

10. To regard; to fix the mind upon.

The pilot doth not attend the unskilful words of the passenger. Sidney.

This is not now a legitimate sense. To express this idea, we now use the verb intransitively, with to, attend to.—11.† To expect.

ATTEND', v. i. To listen; to regard with attention; followed by to.

Attend to the voice of my supplication; Ps. lxxxvi.

Hence much used in the imperative, attend!—2. To regard with observation, and correspondent practice; as, my son, attend to my words. Hence, to regard with compliance.

He hath attended to the voice of my prayer; Ps. lxvi.

3. To fix the attention upon, as an object of pursuit; to be busy or engaged in; as, to attend to the study of the Scriptures.—4. To wait on; to accompany or be present, in pursuance of duty; with on or upon; as, to attend upon a committee; to attend upon business. Hence,—5. To wait on, in service or worship; to serve.

That ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction; 1 Cor. vii.

6.† To stay; to delay.

For this perfection she must yet attend,
Till to her Maker she espoused be. Davies.

7. To wait; to be within call.

ATTEND'ANCE, n. [Fr.] The act of waiting on, or serving.

Of which no man gave attendance at the altar; Heb. vii.

2. A waiting on; a being present on business of any kind; as, the attendance of witnesses or persons in court; attendance of members of parliament.—3. Service; ministry.

Receive attendance. Shak.

4. The persons attending; a train; a retinue.—5. Attention; regard; careful application of mind.

Give attendance to reading; 1 Tim. iv.

6.† Expectation.

ATTEND'ANT, a. Accompanying; being present, or in the train.

companying; waiting on; superintending or taking care of; being present; immediately consequent to; serving; listening; regarding with care.

ATTENT', a. Attentive; 2 Chron. vi.

ATTENT'ATES, n. Proceedings in a court of judicature, after an inhibition is decreed.

ATTEN'TION, n. The act of attending or heeding; the due application of the ear to sounds, or of the mind to objects presented to its contemplation [Literally, a stretching toward.]

They say the tongues of dying men
Enforce attention like deep harmony.
Shak.

2. Act of civility, or courtesy; as, attention to a stranger.

ATTENT'IVE, a. [Fr. attentif.] Heedful; intent; observant; regarding with care. It is applied to the senses of hearing and seeing, as an attentive ear or eye; to the application of the mind, as in contemplation; or to the application of the mind, together with the senses above mentioned, as when a person is attentive to the words, the manner and matter of a speaker at the same time.

ATTENT'IVELY, adv. Heedfully; carefully; with fixed attention.

ATTENT'IVENESS, n. The state of being attentive; heedfulness; attention.

ATTEN'UANT, a. [See ATTENUATE.] Making thin, as fluids; diluting; rendering less dense and viscid.

ATTEN'UANT, n. A medicine which thins the humours, subtilizes their parts, dissolves viscidity, and disposes the fluids to motion, circulation, and secretion; a diluent The existence of any such power in medicine is hypothetical, except, indeed, in as far as all diluents must attenuate the blood by increasing the proportion of its fluid to that of its solid contents.

ATTEN'UATE, v. t. [L. attenuo, of ad and tenuo, to make thin; L. tenuis; W. tenau; Ir. tana or tanaidhe; Eng. thin; which see.] 1. To make thin or less consistent; to subtilize or break the humours of the body into finer parts; to render less viscid; opposed to condense. incrassate, or thicken. 2. To comminute; to break or wear solid substances into finer or very minute parts.

This uninterrupted motion must attenuate and wear away the hardest rocks.
Trans. of Chaptal's Chemistry.

3. To make slender; to reduce in thickness.

ATTEN'UATE, a. Made thin, or less viscid; made slender.

ATTEN'UATED, pp. Made thin or less viscid; comminuted; made slender. In bot., growing slender toward an extremity.

ATTEN'UATING, ppr. Making thin, as fluids; making fine, as solid substances; making slender or lean.

ATTENUA'TION, n. The act of making thin, as fluids; as, the attenuation of the humours.—2. The act of making fine, by comminution, or attrition.

The action of the air facilitates the attenuation of these rocks. Trans. Chaptal.

3. The act or process of making slender, thin, or lean.

AT'TERATE, v. t. [L. attero, to wear.] 1. To wear away.—2. To form or accumulate by wearing.

AT'TERATED, pp. Formed by wearing.

ATTERA'TION, n. The operation of forming land by the wearing of the sea, and the wearing of the earth in one place and deposition of it in another.

ATTEST', v. t. [Fr. attester; L attestor: of ad and testor, to affirm or bear witness, from testis. See TESTIFY.] 1. To bear witness to; to certify; to affirm to be true or genuine; to make a solemn declaration in words or writing, to support a fact; appropriately used for the affirmation of persons in their official capacity; as, to attest the truth of a writing; to attest a copy of record. Persons also attest writings by subscribing their names.—2. To bear witness, or support the truth of a fact, by other evidence than words; as, the ruins of Palmyra attest its ancient magnificence.—3. To call to witness; to invoke as conscious.

The sacred streams which heaven's imperial state
Attests in oaths, and fears to violate.
Dryden.

ATTEST', n. Witness; testimony; attestation. [Lit. us.]

ATTESTA'TION, n. Testimony; witness; a solemn or official declaration, verbal or written, in support of a fact; evidence. The truth appears from the attestation of witnesses, or of the proper officer. The subscription of a name to a writing is an attestation.

ATTEST'ED, pp. Proved or supported by testimony, solemn or official; witnessed; supported by evidence.

ATTEST'ING, ppr. Witnessing; calling to witness; affirming in support of.

ATTEST'OR, n. One who attests.—Attestor of a cautioner, in Scots law, is one who attests the sufficiency of a cautioner offered in the bill chamber, in a suspension or advocation. This is a form peculiar to the bill chamber; where a doubtful cautioner is offered, a person is required to attest his sufficiency, and to become subsidiarie liable for the debt.

AT'TIC, a. [L. Atticus; Gr. Ἀττικός] Pertaining to Attica in Greece, or to its principal city, Athens. Thus, Attic wit. Attic salt, a poignant, delicate wit, peculiar to the Athenians; Attic faith, inviolable faith.—Attic base, a peculiar base used by the ancient architects in the Ionic order, or column; and by Palladio and others, in the Doric; consisting of an upper torus, a scotia, and lower torus with fillets between them. —Attic order, an order of small square pillars at the uppermost extremity of a building. This had its origin in Athens, and was intended to conceal the roof. These pillars should never exceed one third of the length of the order in which they are placed, nor be less than one quarter of it.—Attic story, a story in the upper part of a house, where the windows usually are square.

AT'TIC, n. A low story erected over a principal order, generally decorated with pilasters and a cornice, but having neither capital nor base. The term Attic story, is applied to a low story at the top of a house, and the rooms are termed attics.—2. An Athenian; an Athenian author.

AT'TICAL, a. Pertaining to Athens; pure, classical.

AT'TICISM, n. The peculiar style and idiom of the Greek language, used by the Athenians; refined and elegant Greek; concise and elegant expression. —2. A particular attachment to the Athenians.

AT'TICIZE, v. t. To conform or make conformable to the language or idiom of Attica. Adjectives in ος, when atticized, become ως.

AT'TICIZE, v. i. To use atticisms, or the idiom of the Athenians.

AT'TICS, n. plur. The title of a book in Pausanias, which treats of Attica.—2. Plural of Attic on buildings.

ATTIG'UOUS,† a. [ad and tango, to touch.] Near, adjoining; hard by.

ATTIG'UOUSNESS,† n. The quality or state of being attiguous.

ATTINGE', v. t. [L. attingo, to touch upon.] To touch lightly.

ATTIRE, v. t. [Norm. attyrer, to provide; Fr. atours, dress, attire; atourner, to dress a bride, to attire; atourneresse, a tire woman; Arm. atourm, female ornaments; G. zieren, to adorn. We retain tire, the simple word, applied to the band of a wheel, and this word, in the D. toer, coincides with tour.] To dress; to array; to adorn with elegant or splendid garments.

With the linen mitre shall Aaron be attired; Lev. xvi.

ATTIRE, n. Dress; clothes; habit; but appropriately, ornamental dress.

Can a bride forget her attire? Jer. ii.

2. In her., a term which designates the horns of stags, and similar animals in blazoning arms. The attires of a stag are both the horns affixed to the scalp.—3. In bot., the generative parts of plants. Florid attire, called thrums or suits, as in the flowers of marygold or tansy, consists of two or three parts, of which the outer part is the floret. Semiform attire consists of the chives and apexes.

ATTIRED, pp. Dressed; decked with ornaments or attire. In her., an epithet used in blazoning, in application to such animals as stags, harts, &c., which are provided with horns.

ATTIRER, n. One who dresses or adorns with attire.

ATTIRING, ppr. Dressing; adorning with dress or attire.

ATTI'TLE,† v t. To entitle.

AT'TITUDE, n. [Fr. attitude, posture; Sp. actitud, from L. actus, ago. The Italian attitudine is posture and fitness; attitude and aptitude being united in the same word] 1. In paint., and sculpture, the posture or action in which a figure or statue is placed; the gesture of a figure or statue; such a disposition of the parts as serves to express the action and sentiments of the person represented.—2. Posture; position of things or persons: as, in times of trouble let the prince or a nation preserve a firm attitude.

ATTITU'DINAL, a. Pertaining to attitude.

ATTOL'LENT, a. [L. attollens, attollo, of ad and tollo, to lift.] Lifting up; raising; as, an attollent muscle.

ATTOL'LENT, n. A muscle which raises some part, as the ear, the tip of the nose, or the upper eyelid; otherwise called levator or elevator.

ATTORN', v. i. [L. ad and torno; Fr. tourner; Arm. tuirgna, turnein, to turn; It. attornare, torniare. Hence torniamento, a tournament. See TURN.] In the feudal law, to turn, or transfer homage and service from one lord to another. This is the act of feudatories, vassals or tenants, upon the alienation of the estate.

ATTORN'EY, n. plur. attorneys. [Norm. attournon; torne, id.; from tour, tourn, turn, change. One who takes the turn or place of another. See AT-

TORN and TURN.] One who is appointed or admitted in the place of another, to manage his matters in law. The word formerly signified any person who did business for another; but its sense is now chiefly or wholly restricted to persons who act as substitutes for the persons concerned, in prosecuting and defending actions before courts of justice, or in transacting other business in which legal rights are involved. The word answers to the procurator (proctor) of the civilians. Attorneys are not admitted to practise in courts, until examined, approved, licensed, and sworn, by direction of some court; after which they are proper officers of the court. In Great Britain, and in some of the United States, attorneys are not permitted to be advocates or counsel in the higher courts; this privilege being confined to counsellors and sergeants. In other states, there is no distinction of rank, and attorneys practise in all the courts. And in a general sense, the word attorney comprehends counsellors, barristers, and sergeants. In Scotland there is not a class of practitioners in law who take the name of attorneys. The office of attorney in Scotland is private, and conferred by letters of attorney, which regulate the extent of power conferred on the attorney. In Virginia, the duties of attorney, counsellor, conveyancer, and advocate, are all performed by the same individual. An attorney may have general powers to transact business for another; or his power may be special, or limited to a particular act or acts.—Attorney General, is an officer appointed to manage business for the king, the state, or public; and his duty, in particular, is to prosecute persons guilty of crimes.—A letter or warrant of attorney is a written authority from one person empowering another to transact business for him.

ATTORN'EY,† v. t. To perform by proxy; to employ as a proxy.

ATTORN'EYSHIP, n. The office of an attorney; agency for another.

ATTORN'ING, ppr. Acknowledging a new lord, or transferring homage and fealty to the purchaser of an estate.

ATTORN'MENT, n. The act of a feudatory, vassal, or tenant, by which he consents, upon the alienation of an estate, to receive a new lord or superior, and transfers to him his homage and service.

ATTRACT', v. t. [L. attraho, attractus, of ad and traho, to draw. See DRAG and DRAW.] 1. To draw to; to cause to move toward, and unite with; as, electrical bodies attract straws, and light substances, by physical laws.—2. To draw to or incline to unite with, though some cause may prevent the union; as, the sun is supposed to attract the planets.—3. To draw by influence of a moral kind; to invite or allure; as, to attract admirers.—4. To engage; as, to attract attention.

ATTRACT',† n. Attraction.

ATTRACTABIL'ITY, n. The quality of being attractable, or of being subject to the law of attraction.

ATTRACT'ABLE, a. That may be attracted; subject to attraction.

ATTRACT'ED, pp. Drawn toward; invited; allured; engaged.

ATTRACT'IC, † } a. Having power
ATTRACT'ICAL,† } to draw to.

ATTRACT'ILE, a. That has power to attract.

ATTRACT'ING, ppr. Drawing to, or toward; inviting; alluring; engaging.

ATTRACT'INGLY, adv. In an attracting manner.

ATTRAC'TION, n. The power in bodies which is supposed to draw them together; or the tendency or principle which inclines them to unite or cohere; called by Copernicus, appetence. This power, principle, or tendency in bodies to unite, is distinguished by philosophers into attraction of gravity, or gravitation, which extends to a sensible distance, such as the tendency of the planets to the sun, or of a stone, when raised in the air, to fall to the earth, and of which kind is the attraction of magnetism, and of electricity; and into attraction of cohesion, or that tendency which is manifested between small particles of matter, at insensible distances, or near the point of contact, to unite them in coherence. The attraction of gravity is supposed to be the great principle which confines the planets in their orbits. Its power or force is directly as the quantity of matter in a body, and inversely as the square of the distances of the attracting bodies.—2. The act of attracting; the effect of the principle of attraction.

Attraction may be performed by impulse or other means. Newton's Optics.

3. The power or act of alluring, drawing to, inviting, or engaging; as, the attraction of beauty or eloquence. Contiguous attraction, is that which is exerted between minute particles or atoms, at insensible distances. When this principle unites particles of the same kind, it is called aggregation, or cohesion. When it operates on dissimilar particles, producing union, it is distinguished as heterogeneous, and called chemical attraction, or affinity. Elective attraction, in chem., a variety of affinity. It is that power in substances, which elects, or selects from a mixture those elements with which they have the strongest tendency to combine. Capillary attraction.—See CAPILLARY.

ATTRACT'IVE, a. [Fr. attractif.] 1. Having the quality of attracting; drawing to; as, the attractive force of bodies.—2. Drawing to by moral influence; alluring; inviting; engaging; as, the attractive graces.

An attractive undertaking. Roscoe.

ATTRACT'IVELY, adv. With the power of attracting or drawing to.

ATTRACT'IVENESS, n. The quality of being attractive, or engaging.

ATTRACT'OR, n. The person or thing that attracts.

ATTRA'HENT, a. [L. attrahens.] Drawing to; or as a noun, that which draws to.

ATTRAP',† v. t. [Qu. Fr. drap, cloth.] To clothe; to dress.

ATTRECTA'TION, n. [L. attrectatio.] Frequent handling.

ATTRIB'UTABLE, a. [See ATTRIBUTE.] That may be ascribed; imputed, or attributed; ascribable; imputable; as, the fault is not attributable to the author.

ATTRIB'UTE, v. t. [L. attribuo; ad and tribuo, to divide, to bestow, to assign; tribus, a tribe, division, or ward; Fr. attribuer See TRIBE.] 1. To allot, or attach, in contemplation; to ascribe; to consider as belonging

We attribute nothing to God, that contains a contradiction. Tillotson.

2. To give as due; to yield as an act of the mind; as, to attribute to God all the glory of redemption.—3. To impute, as to a cause; as, our misfortunes are generally to be attributed to our follies or imprudence.

AT'TRIBUTE, n. That which is attributed; that which is considered as belonging to, or inherent in; as, power and wisdom are attributes of the Supreme Being; or a quality determining something to be after a certain manner; as, extension is an attribute of body.—2. Quality; characteristic disposition; as bravery and generosity in men.—3. A thing belonging to another; an appendant; as, the arms of a warrior. In paint., and sculp., a symbol of office or character, added to the principal figure as, a club is the attribute of Hercules. —4. Reputation; honour. [Not a proper sense of this word.]

ATTRIB'UTED, pp. Ascribed; yielded as due; imputed.

ATTRIB'UTING, ppr. Ascribing; yielding, or giving as due; imputing.

ATTRIBU'TION, n. The act of attributing, or the quality ascribed; commendation.

ATTRIB'UTIVE, a. Pertaining to, or expressing an attribute.

ATTRIB'UTIVE, n. In gram., a word significant of an attribute; as, an adjective, verb, or particle, which is the attribute of a substance.

ATTRITE, a. [L. attritus, worn, of ad and tero, to wear; Gr. τείρω. See TRITE.] Worn by rubbing, or friction. [See TRITE, which is now generally used.]

ATTRITENESS, n. The being much worn.

ATTRI''TION, n. Abrasion; the act of wearing by friction, or rubbing substances together.

The change of aliment is effected by the attrition of the stomach. Arbuthnot.

2. The state of being worn.—3. With divines, grief for sin arising from fear of punishment; the lowest degree of repentance. In med. lan., attrition is applied to a graze, or abrasion of the cuticle, to the crushing of a part by violence, and to a severe kind of cardialgia, or heart-burn, accompanied with great pain and sense of suffocation.

ATTUNE, v. t. [of ad and tune. See TONE and TUNE.] 1. To make musical.

Vernal airs attune the trembling leaves. Milton.

2 To tune, or put in tune; to adjust one sound to another; to make accordant; as, to attune the voice to a harp.

ATTUNED, pp. Made musical, or harmonious; accommodated in sound.

ATTUNING, ppr. Putting in tune; making musical, or accordant in sound.

ATTWOOD'S MACHINE, n. An ingenious apparatus, invented by the late Mr. Attwood, of Trinity College, Cambridge, to illustrate the doctrine of accelerated motion. Its design is to produce a force of the same kind as gravity, but of much less intensity. It consists of a strong upright pillar, which supports a stand, on which is placed friction wheels. Immediately under the stand is an upright shaft, divided into inches, half-inches, and tenths, for measuring the space through which a body descends. The axis of a wheel rests upon the rims of the friction wheels, and a silk cord passes over this wheel, having equal weights attached to its extremities. In this situation the weights balance each other and no motion ensues; but if to one of the weights a small quantity be add ed, it will preponderate, and begin to descend, and draw up the other weight. Thus an accelerated motion will be produced, and the rate of descent may be rendered so slow, as to afford time to observe the space descended in a given time, and the velocity acquired at the end of the descent. A seconds pendulum is attached to the apparatus to measure the time of descent.

ATWAIN,† adv. In twain; asunder.

ATWEEN',† adv. Between.

ATWIXT',† adv Betwixt.

ATWO,† adv. In two.

AUBAINE, n. (auba'in.) [Fr. aubain, an alien.] The droit d'aubaine, in France, was a right of the king to the goods of an alien dying within his jurisdiction, the king standing in the place of the heirs.

AU'BIN, n. In horsemanship, a broken kind of gait, between an amble and a gallop; accounted a defect.

AU'BURN, a. [This word is evidently formed from brun, bruno, Fr. and It. brown, by a transposition of the letters r and n, with a prefix, auburn, for au-brun, from brennan, burn, denoting the colour made by scorching.] Brown; of a dark colour.

His auburn locks on either shoulder flowed. Dryden.

AUCHT, n. [A. Sax. acht.] Possession; property. (Scotch.)

AUC'TION, n. [L. auctio, a public sale; Eng. to hawk; G. höken; properly, to cry out. See HAWK.] 1. A public sale of property to the highest bidder, and regularly, by a person licensed and authorized for the purpose; a vendue. Contracts for services, sometimes, are sold to the lowest bidder. By the Romans, this species of sale was made by a crier, sub hasta, under a spear stuck in the earth.—2. The thing sold at auction.

AUC'TIONARY, a. Belonging to an auction, or public sale.

AUCTIONEER', n. [L. auctionarius.] The person who sells at auction; a person licensed by government to dispose of goods or land by public sale to the highest bidder.

AUCTIONEER', v. t. To sell at auction.

AUC'TUS, a. [Lat.] Increased; multiplied. In bot., applied to a calyx which has the addition of another smaller one.

AU'CUBA, n. The Japanese name of a diœcious plant, now cultivated in our gardens as a hardy evergreen shrub, remarkable for its shining pale green leaves, mottled with yellow.

AUCUPA'TION, n. [L. aucupatio, from aucupor, of avis and capio.] The act or practice of taking birds; fowling; bird-catching. [Lit. us.]

AUDA'CIOUS, a. [L. audax; Fr. audacieux; from L. audeo, to dare. The sense is, advancing forward.] 1. Very bold or daring; impudent; contemning the restraints of law, religion, or decorum; used for bold in wickedness; applied to persons; as, an audacious wretch.—2. Committed with, or proceeding from, daring effrontery, or contempt of law; as, an audacious crime. —3. Bold; spirited.

AUDA'CIOUSLY, adv. In an impudent manner; with excess of boldness.

AUDA'CIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being audacious; impudence; audacity.

AUDAC'ITY, n. Boldness, sometimes in a good sense; daring spirit, resolution, or confidence.—2. Audaciousness; impudence; in a bad sense; implying a contempt of law or moral restraint.

AUD'EANISM, n. Anthropomorphism; or the doctrine of Audeus, who maintained that God has a human shape; from Gen. i. 26.

AUD'IBLE, a. [L. audibilis, from audio, to hear. This word is evidently connected with the name of the ear; Gr. ους, ωτος: Vulg. Gr. αυλια. The verb is contracted into Sp oir; Port. ouvir; Fr. ouïr, to hear. Hence in law oyer, and from the French oyez, hear ye, the barbarous O yes of law courts.] That may be heard; perceivable by the ear; loud enough to be heard; as, an audible voice or whisper.

AUD'IBLENESS, n. The quality of being audible.

AUD'IBLY, adv. In an audible manner; in a manner so as to be heard.

AUD'IENCE, n. The act of hearing, or attending to sounds.

His bold discourse had audience. Milton.

2 Admittance to a hearing; public reception to an interview; a ceremony observed in courts, or by official characters, when ambassadors or applicants to men in office are permitted to appear and state their business in person. --3. An auditory; an assembly of hearers. --4. In the Spanish dominions, a court; as the audience of Seville, which is a court of oyer and terminer; and the audience pretorial, in the Indies, which is a high court of judicature. The word in Spain also signifies certain law-officers, appointed to institute a judicial inquiry.—5. In England, a court held by the archbishop of Canterbury, on the subject of consecrations, elections, institutions, marriages, &c.

AUD'IENCE-CHAMBER, n. An apartment for an audience or formal meeting.

AUD'IENCE-COURT, n. A court of the archbishop of Canterbury, of equal authority with the arches-court, though of less dignity.

AUD'IENT,† n. A hearer.

AUD'IT, n. [L. audit, he hears.] 1. An examination of an account, or of accounts, with a hearing of the parties concerned, by proper officers, or persons appointed for that purpose, who compare the charges with the vouchers, examine witnesses, and state the balance.—2. The result of such an examination or account as adjusted by auditors; a final account.

AUD'IT, v. t To examine and adjust an account, or accounts, by proper officers, or by persons legally authorized for the purpose; as, to audit the accounts of a treasurer, or of parties who have a suit depending in court.

AUD'IT-HOUSE, n. An appendage to a cathedral, in which the business belonging to it is transacted.

Audita querela. [L.] In law, a writ of complaint for redress of a wrong.

AUD'ITIVE, a. Having the power of hearing.

AUD'ITOR, [L.] A hearer; one who attends to hear a discourse.—2. A person appointed and authorized to examine an account, or accounts, compare the charges with the vouchers, examine the parties and witnesses, allow or reject charges, and state the balance. It is usual with courts to refer accounts, on which an action is brought, to auditors for adjustment, and their report, if received, is the basis of the judgment. In England, there are officers who are auditors of courts; as, the auditors of the Exchequer, of the receipts, &c. Auditor of the Court of Session, an officer appointed by the crown, to whom either of the Divisions, or any Lord Ordinary, may remit to tax the costs of a suit in which expenses are found due.

AUD'ITORSHIP, n. The office of auditor.

AUD'ITORY, a. That has the power of hearing; pertaining to the sense or organs of hearing; as the auditory nerve.

AUD'ITORY, n. [L. auditorium.] 1. An audience; an assembly of hearers, as in a church or lecture-room.—2. A place or apartment where discourses are delivered. In ancient churches, the nave, where the hearers stood to be instructed.—3. A bench on which a judge sits to hear causes. Auditory artery, in anat. the artery which goes off from each side of the arteria basilaris, to the organ of hearing, and accompanies the auditory nerve. Auditory passage, (auditorius meatus,) the passage of entrance into the ear, and which conveys the sound to the auditory nerve. Auditory nerves, a pair of nerves arising from the medulla oblongata, and distributed, the one to the ear, and the other to the nose, lips, &c.

AUD'ITRESS, n. A female hearer.

AUF, n. A fool; a simpleton. [See OAF.]

AUGE'AN, a. The Augean stable, in Grecian mythology, is represented as belonging to Augeas, or Augias, one of the Argonauts, and afterwards king of Elis. This prince kept a great number of oxen, in a stable which was never cleansed, until Hercules undertook the task; a task which it seemed impracticable to execute. Hence, the Augean stable came to represent what is deemed impracticable, or a place which has not, for a long time, been cleansed

AUG'ER, n. [D. avegaar. The Saxon word is nafe-gar, or naue-gar, from nafa, the nave of a wheel, and gar, a tool, or a borer. It is probable that the real word is naugar, corrupted.] An instrument for boring large holes, chiefly used by carpenters, joiners, cabinet-makers, wheelwrights, and shipwrights. It consists of an iron blade, ending in a steel bit, with a handle placed at right angles with the blade. Augers, made with a straight channel or groove, in some places, are called pod-augers; the modern augers, with spiral channels, are called screw-augers. The same name is given to instruments used for boring the soil, for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the subsoil, the minerals, and in agriculture more especially, the existence of water. These augers are of various kinds, but they all consist of three parts, namely, a handle for working the instrument by the means of two or more men; the bit, mouth, or cutting piece; and certain rods for connecting the handle with the bit or cutting piece.

AUG'ER-HOLE, n. A hole made by an auger.

AUGHT, n. (aut.) [Sax. awiht, aht, or owiht, ohwit, oht, from wiht, wight, a creature, animal, thing, any thing. This wiht, seems to be our wight and whit; and I suspect the L. qui, quæ, quod, quid, what, to be the same word varied in orthography. This word should not be written ought.] 1. Any thing, indefinitely.

But go, my son, and see if aught be wanting. Addison.

2. Any part; the smallest; a jot or tittle.

There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken; Josh. xxi.

AU'GITE, n. [Gr. αυγη, brightness.] A mineral called by Haüy, pyroxene; often found in distinct crystals. Its secondary forms are all six or eight-sided prisms. Sometimes it appears in hemitrope crystals. It has a foliated structure, and is harder than hornblend. The varieties are, common augite, sahlite, fassaite, and coccolite. The omphacite of Werner appears also to be a variety; and the common augite, found near the lake Baikal, has been called Baikalite. Werner divides augite into four sub-species; granular, foliated, conchoidal, and common; and there is a variety called slaggy augite.

AUGIT'IC, a. Pertaining to augite; resembling augite, or partaking of its nature and characters. Augitic porphyry, a rock with a dark gray, or greenish base, containing crystals of augite, and labrador of felspar.

AUGMENT', v. t. [Fr. augmenter; L. augmento, augmentum, from augeo, auxi, to increase; Gr. αυξω, αεξω, which seems to be the Eng. to wax, or to eke; Sax. eacan.] 1. To increase; to enlarge in size or extent; to swell; to make bigger; as, to augment an army, by reinforcement; rain augments a stream. —2. To increase or swell the degree, amount, or magnitude; as, impatience augments an evil.

AUGMENT', v. i. To increase; to grow larger; as, a stream augments by rain.

AUG'MENT, n. Increase; enlargement by addition; state of increase.—2. In philology, a syllable prefixed to a word; or an increase of the quantity of the initial vowel. Among physicians, a term applied to the period of a fever between its commencement and its height.

AUGMENT'ABLE, a. That may be increased; capable of augmentation.

AUGMENTA'TION, n. The act of increasing, or making larger, by addition, expansion, or dilatation.—2. The state of being increased, or enlarged.—3. The thing added by which a thing is enlarged.—4. In music, a doubling the value of the notes of the subject of a fugue or canon. Augmentation Court, in England, a court erected by 27 Hen. VIII., to augment the revenues of the crown, by the suppression of monasteries. It was long ago dissolved. Process of augmentation, in Scotland, is a process in the tiend court, raised by the minister of a parish against the titular and heritors, for the purpose of obtaining an augmentation of his stipend. In her., augmentation consists in additional charges to a coat-armour, often as marks of honour, borne on the escutcheon, or a canton.

AUGMENT'ATIVE, a. Having the quality or power of augmenting.

AUGMENT'ER, n. He that augments.

AUGMENT'ING, ppr. Increasing; enlarging.

AU'GUR, n. [L. augur. The first syllable is from avis, a fowl; but the meaning and origin of the last syllable are not obvious.] 1. Among the Romans, an officer whose duty was to foretell future events by the singing, chattering, flight, and feeding of birds. There was a college or community of augurs, originally three in number, and afterwards nine, four patricians and five plebeians. They bore a staff or wand, and were held in great respect.—2. One who pretends to foretell future events by omens.

We all know that augur cannot look at augur without laughing. Buckminster.

AU'GUR, v. i. To guess; to conjecture by signs, or omens; to prognosticate.

AU'GUR, v. t. To predict, or foretell; as, to augur ill success.

AU'GURAL, a. [L. auguralis.] Pertaining to an augur, or to prediction by the appearance of birds. The Romans had their augural staff and augural books.

AU'GURATE, v. i. To judge by augury; to predict. [Lit. us.]

AUGURA'TION, n. The practice of augury, or the foretelling of events by the chattering and flight of birds. It may be used for prediction by other signs and omens.

AU'GURED, pp. Conjectured by omens; prognosticated.

AU'GURER, n. An augur. [Not legitimate.]

AUGU'RIAL, a. Relating to augurs.

AU'GURIZE,† v. t. To augur.

AU'GUROUS, a. Predicting; foretelling; foreboding.

AU'GURY, n. [L. augurium.] The art or practice of foretelling events by the flight or chattering of birds.—2. An omen; prediction; prognostication.

AUGUST', a. [L. augustus. The first syllable of this word is probably from the root of augeo, or of awe.] Grand; magnificent; majestic; impressing awe; inspiring reverence.

The Trojan chief appeared, august in visage. Dryden.

It is related that this epithet was first conferred by the Roman senate upon Octavius, after confirming him in the sovereign power.

AU'GUST, n. The eighth month of the year, containing thirty-one days. The old Roman name was Sextilis, the sixth month from March, the month in which the primitive Romans, as well as Jews, began the year. The name was changed to August in honour of the emperor Octavius Augustus, on account of his victories, and his entering on his first consulate in that month.

AUGUST'AN, a. Pertaining to Augustus; as, the Augustan age.—2. The Augustan confession, drawn up at Augusta or Augsburg, by Luther and Melanchthon, in 1530, contains the principles of the Protestants, and their reasons for separating from the Romish church.

AUGUSTIN'IANS, n. Those divines, who from St. Augustin, maintain that grace is effectual from its nature, absolutely and morally, not relatively and gradually.

AUGUST'INS, AUGUSTIN'IANS, } n. A monastic fraternity, so called from St. Augustin. They originally were hermits, and called Austin friars. They were congregated into one body by pope Alexander IV., under Lanfranc, in 1256. They clothe in black, and make one of the four orders of mendicants.

AUGUST'NESS, n. Dignity of mien; grandeur; magnificence.

AUK, n. [contracted from Alca.] The Alca, a genus of aquatic fowls, of the order of Anseres, including the northern penguin or great auk, the little auk or black and white diver, the puffin, &c. The auk is observed by seamen never to wander beyond soundings, and accordingly they conclude, on its appearance, that land is not very remote. These birds breed in large companies, in caverns and rocky cliffs, laying only one disproportionately large egg. The young are said to be fed from the crops of the parents.

AULA'RIAN, n. [L. aula, a hall.] At Oxford, the member of a hall, distinguished from a collegian.

AULD,† a. [Sax. ald.] Old. Shak. Auld is also used in the Scottish dialect, to signify old. Auld farrand or Auld farrant, sagacious; prudent; usually applied to children when they discover more sagacity than could be expected at their time of life.

AULET'IC, a. [Gr. αυλητικος, from αυλος, a pipe.] Pertaining to pipes or to a pipe. [Lit. us.]

AU'LIC, a. [L. aulicus, from aula, a hall, court or palace; Gr. αυλη.] Pertaining to a royal court. The epithet is probably confined to the German empire, where it is used to designate certain courts or officers composing the courts. The aulic council is composed of a president, who is a Catholic, a vice-chancellor and eighteen counsellors, nine of whom are Protestants, and nine Catholics. They always follow the emperor's court, and decide without an appeal. This council ceases at the death of the emperor. The Aulic, in some European universities, is an act of a young divine, on being admitted a doctor of divinity. It begins by a harangue of the chancellor addressed to the young doctor, after which he receives the cap and presides at the Aulic or disputation.

AUMAIL,† v. t. [Fr. email.] To figure or variegate.

AUMBRY. See AMBRY.

AUME, n. A Dutch measure for Rhenish wine, containing forty gallons.

AU'MONE, n. A law term signifying alms. Tenure in Aumone, in law, signifies a tenure where lands are given in alms to some church or religious house.

AUN'CEL-WEIGHT, n. An ancient kind of balance, now out of use. It was very inaccurate, and great deceptions were practised by it. In many parts of England, Auncel-weight signifies meat sold by the hand, without scales.

AUNE, n. [A contraction of aulne, ulna.] A French cloth measure, but of different lengths in different parts of the country. At Rouen, it is an English ell; at Calais, 1.52; at Lyons, 1.061; at Paris, 0.95. All now superseded by the mètre.

ÄUNT, n. [L. amita, contracted. Qu. Fr. tante.] The sister of one's father or mother, correlative to nephew or niece.

AU'RA, n. [L. from Heb. יאר, iar, a stream; Gr. αυρα. See AIR.] Literally, a breeze, or gentle current of air, but used by English writers for a stream of fine particles flowing from a body, as effluvia, aroma, or odour; an exhalation.

AURANTIA'CEÆ, n. [from aurum, gold.] The orange tribe; they are dicotyledonous, polypetalous plants, with dark-green jointed leaves, filled with fragrant essential oil, collected in little transparent dots, and a superior ovary changing to a succulent berry, the rind of which is also filled with fragrant essential oil. This nat. order consists of trees or shrubs found exclusively in the temperate or tropical parts of the Old World, and unknown in a wild state in America. Their flowers are usually odoriferous, and their fruits subacid.

AURAN'TIUM, n. The orange, so called from its golden colour; it belongs to the genus citrus.

AU'RATE, n. [Supposed to be from aurum, gold.] A sort of pear.

AU'RATE, n. [L. aurum, gold; Fr. or; from the Heb. and Ch. אור, aoor, light, fire, and to shine, from its colour; Ir. or; W. aur; Corn. our.] A combination of auric acid with a base, as aurate of potash.

AU'RATED, a. Resembling gold.—2. Combined with auric acid.

AU'RATED, a. [L. auris, the ear.] Eared; having ears like the scallop-shell.

AU'REA ALEXANDRI'NA, n. A compound opiate confection, much in repute among the ancient physicians, as a powerful antidote to poison.

AU'REATE, a. Golden.

AURE'LIA, n. [from aurum, or aur, gold, from its colour. See CHRYSALIS.] In nat. hist., the nymph or chrysalis of an insect; or the form of an animal, like a worm or maggot, covered with a hardish pellicle, and in a state of seeming insensibility. From this state, it changes to a moth, butterfly, or other winged insect.

AURE'LIAN, a. Like or pertaining to the aurelia.

AURE'OLA, n. [L. aurum, gold.] A circle of rays of light, emblematical of glory. A name which the old painters gave to the crown of glory with which they adorned the heads of the saints, martyrs, confessors, &c.

AU'RIC, a. [from aurum, gold.] Pertaining to gold. The auric acid is a saturated combination of gold and oxygen.

AU'RICLE, n. [L. auricula, dim, from auris, the ear.] 1. The external ear, or that part which is prominent from the head.—2. The auricles of the heart are two muscular bags, situated at the base, serving as diverticula for the blood, during the diastole. They resemble the auricle of the ear, and cover the ventricles of the heart, like caps. Their systole or contraction corresponds to the diastole of the heart, and vice versâ. They receive the blood from the veins, and communicate it to the ventricles.

AU'RICLED, a. Having ears; having appendages resembling ears; applied to leaves when they are furnished with a pair of leaflets, generally distinct, but sometimes joined with them.

AURIC'ULA, n. That species of Primula called, from the shape of its leaves, bear's ear. It is found wild abundantly on the Swiss Alps, and has for centuries been an object of cultivation by florists, who have succeeded in raising from seed a great number of varieties, having but little resemblance to the wild plant, except in foliage. Auricula in zool., is a genus of phytophagous or plant-eating trachelipods, whose organs of respiration are formed for breathing air.

AURIC'ULÆ JUDÆ, n. A sort of fungus which grows on elder trees. A decoction of it in milk has been much esteemed as a gargle in cases of quinsey.

AURIC'ULAR, a. [from L. auricula, the ear.] 1. Pertaining to the ear; within the sense of hearing; told in the ear; as, auricular confession.—2. Recognized by the ear; known by the sense of hearing; as, auricular evidence. – 3. Traditional; known by report; as, auricular traditions.

AURIC'ULARLY, adv. In a secret manner; by way of whisper, or voice addressed to the ear.

AURIC'ULATE, a. Shaped like the ear. In bot., a leaf is said to be auriculate, when it is furnished at its base with a pair of leaflets properly distinct, but occasionally liable to be joined to it.

AURIC'ULATED, a. Having large or elongated ears; as, the auriculated vulture.

AURIF'EROUS, a. [L. aurifer, from aurum, gold, and fero, to produce.] That yields or produces gold; as, auriferous sands or streams.

AU'RIFORM, a. [L. auris, the ear, and forma, form.] Ear-shaped; having the form of the human ear; in the shape of an ear; as an auriform shell.

AURI'GA, n. [L. of aurea, orea, a head-stall, a bridle, and rego, to govern or manage.] 1. Literally, the director of a car, or waggon. In astr., the Waggoner, a constellation in the northern hemisphere, consisting of twenty-three stars, according to Tycho; forty, according to Hevelius; and sixty-eight, in the British catalogue.—2. The fourth lobe of the liver; also a bandage for the sides.

AURIGA'TION, n. [L. auriga.] The act or practise of driving horses harnessed to carriages.

AURIPIGMEN'TUM. See ORPIMENT.

AU'RISCALP, n. [L. auris, ear, and scalpo, to scrape.] An instrument to clean the ears; used also in operations of surgery on the ear.

AU'RIST, n. [L. auris, ear.] One skilled in disorders of the ear, or who professes to cure them.

AU'ROCH, n. [G. urochs, the ure-ox, urus and ox.] A species of wild bull or buffalo, whose bones are found in gravel and alluvial soil.

AURO'RA, n. [L. aurora; Sans. arun; Ch. and Heb. אור, aoor, light, and ירה, ore, to raise.] 1. The rising light of the morning; the dawn of day, or morning twilight.—2. The goddess of the morning, or twilight deified by fancy. The poets represented her as rising out of the ocean, in a chariot, with rosy fingers dropping gentle dew.—3. A species of crowfoot.

Aurora borealis, or lumen boreale; northern twilight. This species of light usually appears in streams, ascending toward the zenith from a dusky line a few degrees above the horizon. Sometimes it assumes a wavy appearance, as in America, in March, 1782, when it overspread the whole hemisphere. Sometimes it appears in detached places; at other times, it almost covers the hemisphere. As the streams of light have a tremulous motion, they are called, in the Shetland isles, merry dancers. They assume all shapes, and a variety of colours, from a pale red or yellow to a deep red or blood colour; and in the northern latitudes, serve to illuminate the earth and cheer the gloom of long winter nights. This light is sometimes near the earth. It is said to have been seen between the spectator and a distant mountain. The appearance of the Aurora borealis so exactly resembles the effects of artificial electricity, that there is every reason to believe that their causes are identical. When electricity passes through rarified air, it exhibits a diffused luminous stream which has all the characteristic appearances of the Aurora, and hence, it is highly probable, that this natural phenomenon is occasioned by the passage of electricity through the upper regions of the atmosphere. The influence of the Aurora upon the magnetic needle is now considered as an ascertained fact, and the connection between it and magnetism is further evident from the fact, that the beams or coruscations issuing from a point in the horizon west or north, are frequently observed to run in the magnetic meridian. At the same time, a luminous arch is occasionally seen stretching across the heavens, and crossing the magnetic meridian at right angles. The Aurora borealis is said to be frequently accompanied by sound, which is variously described as a hissing, a murmuring, a rumbling, and a crackling sound. This has been so positively asserted by different observers, that no doubt can be entertained of the fact.

AURO'RAL, a. Belonging to the aurora, or to the northern lights; resembling the twilight.

AU'RUM, n. [L. See AURATE.] Gold. Aurum fulminans, fulminating gold, is gold dissolved in aqua regia or nitro-muriatic acid, and precipitated by volatile alkali. This precipitate is of a brown yellow, or orange colour, and when exposed to a moderate heat, detonizes with considerable noise. It is a compound of auric acid and ammonia.—Aurum mosaicum, or musivum, a sparkling gold-coloured substance, from an amalgam of quicksilver and tin, mixed with sulphur and sal-ammoniac, set to sublime. The mercury and part of the sulphur unite into a cinnabar, which sublimes with the sal-ammoniac, and leaves the aurum mosaicum at the bottom. It is a sulphuret of tin, and is used as a pigment.

AUSCULTA'TION, n. [L. from antiq. ause, Gr. ους, ωτος, the ear, and cultus, from colo, to use or exercise.] 1. The act of listening, or hearkening to.—2. In med., a method of distinguishing diseases, particularly in the thorax, by observing the sounds in the part generally by means of a tube applied to the surface. This instrument is called a stethoscope. [See STETHOSCOPE.] Auscultation may be used with more or less advantage in all cases where morbid sounds are produced, but its general applications are, the auscultation of respiration, the auscultation of the voice; auscultation of the cough, auscultation of sounds foreign to all these, but sometimes accompanying them; auscultation of the actions of the heart; obstetric auscultation. The practice of auscultation is founded upon well established physical principles. Sounds which are caused by certain actions within the cavities of the body, are transmitted through the walls of the cavity, and are perceived when the ear is applied closely to the surface, or through the intervention of a proper instrument. These sounds are always alike under like circumstances, and are changed when the circumstances which caused them are changed. Hence the physician who renders his ear familiar with the sounds caused by the internal actions of the body in a healthy state, will readily perceive a variation when the part is diseased, and by repeated and extensive observation, will also learn what particular disease is indicated by any particular unnatural sound.

AUSCUL′TATORY, a. Pertaining to hearing or listening.

AU′SPICATE, v. t. [L. auspicor.] To give a favourable turn to; a sense taken from the Roman practice of taking the auspicium, or inspection of birds, before they undertook any important business.—2. To foreshow.—3. To begin.

AU′SPICE, AU′SPICES, n. [L. auspicium, of avis, a bird, and specio, to inspect.] 1. The omens of an undertaking, drawn from birds; the same as augury, which see.—2. Protection; favour shown; patronage; influence. In this sense the word is generally plural, auspices.

AUSPI″CIOUS, a. [See AUSPICE.] Having omens of success, or favourable appearances; as, an auspicious beginning.—2. Prosperous; fortunate; applied to persons; as auspicious chief. —3. Favourable; kind; propitious; applied to persons or things; as, an auspicious mistress.

AUSPI″CIOUSLY, adv. With favourable omens; happily; prosperously; favourably; propitiously.

AUSPI″CIOUSNESS, n. A state of fair promise; prosperity.

AUS′TER, n. [L.] The south wind.

AU′STERE, a. [L. austerus.] Severe; harsh; rigid; stern; applied to persons; as, an austere master; an austere look.—2. Sour; harsh; rough to the taste; applied to things; as, austere fruit, or wine.

AUSTERELY, adv. Severely; rigidly; harshly.

AUSTERENESS, n. Severity in manners; harshness; austerity.—2. Roughness in taste.

AUSTER′ITY, n. [L. austeritas.] Severity of manners or life; rigour; strictness; harsh discipline. It is particularly applied to the mortifications of a monastic life, which are called austerities.

AUS′TRAL, a. [L. australis, from auster, the south wind, or south.] Southern; lying or being in the south; as, austral lands; austral signs.

AUSTRALA′SIA, n. [austral and Asia.] A name given to the countries situated to the south of Asia, comprehending Australia, or New Holland, New Guinea, New Zealand, &c. Australasia is not to be confounded with Australia. The latter word is applied exclusively to the large island which gives its name to this fifth division of the globe.

AUS′TRALIZE, v. i. To tend southwardly.

AUS′TRIAN, a. [from Austria, an empire of central and southern Europe. Ger. Œstreich, or Eastern Kingdom; so called, in early times, relatively to the western dominions of Charlemagne.] Pertaining to Austria.

AUS′TRIAN, n. A native of Austria.

AUS′TRINE, a. [L. austrinus, from auster, south.] South; southerly; southern.

AUS′TROMANCY, n. [from auster, the south wind, and Gr. μαντεια, divination.] Soothsaying, or prediction of future events, from observations of the winds.

Auter droit. [Law Fr.] Another's right.

Auterfoits, a word composed of the French autre, another, and foits, fois, time, introduced into law language, under the Norman princes of England. It signifies, at another time, formerly; as, auterfoits acquit, auterfoits attaint, auterfoits convict, formerly acquitted, attainted, or convicted, which being specially pleaded, is a bar to a second prosecution for the same offence.—Auter foits acquit. [Law Fr.] The plea of a former acquittance.—Auter foits attaint. [Law Fr.] The plea of former attaint.—Auter foits convict. [Law Fr.] The plea of former conviction.

AU′TA, n. A square column set against a wall.

AUTHEN′TIC, AUTHEN′TICAL, a. [Fr. authentique; It. and Sp. autentico; Low L. authenticus, from the Gr. αυθεντικος, from αυθεντης, an author or maker; one who does any thing by his own right; also one who kills himself. The first syllable is from αυτος, which is probably from the root of author, auctor; and the sense of self-murderer seems to indicate that the other constituent of the word is from θεω, θεινω, to kill, but the primary sense of which is, to strike, to drive or thrust with the hand, &c. In the word before us, the sense is to throw, or to set; hence authentic is set, fixed, made or made certain by the author, by one's own self.] 1. Having a genuine original or authority, in opposition to that which is false, fictitious, or counterfeit; being what it purports to be; genuine; true; applied to things; as an authentic paper or register.—2. Of approved authority; as an authentic writer.—3. Authentic melodies, in music, such as have their principal note contained between the key note and its octave.

AUTHEN′TICALLY, adv. In an authentic manner; with the requisite or genuine authority.

AUTHEN′TICALNESS, n. The quality of being authentic; genuineness; the quality of being of good authority; authenticity. [The latter word is generally used.]

AUTHEN′TICATE, v. t. To render authentic; to give authority to, by the proof, attestation, or formalities, required by law, or sufficient to entitle to credit.

The king serves only as a notary to authenticate the choice of judges. Burke.

AUTHEN′TICATED, pp. Rendered authentic; having received the forms which prove genuineness.

AUTHEN′TICATING, ppr. Giving authority by the necessary signature, seal, attestation, or other forms.

AUTHENTICA′TION, n. The act of authenticating; the giving of authority by the necessary formalities.

AUTHENTIC′ITY, n. Genuineness; the quality of being of genuine; original; as the authenticity of the scriptures. [See GENUINENESS.]

AUTHEN′TICNESS, n. Authenticity. [Rarely us.]

AU′THOR, n. [L. auctor; W. awdur; Fr. auteur. The Latin word is from the root of augeo, to increase, or cause to enlarge. The primary sense is one who brings or causes to come forth.] 1. One who produces, creates, or brings into being; as, God is the author of the universe.—2. The beginner, former, or first mover of any thing; hence, the efficient cause of a thing. It is appropriately applied to one who composes or writes a book or original work, and in a more general sense, to one whose occupation is to compose and write books; opposed to compiler or translator. Author, in Scots law, signifies the person from whom a proprietor has purchased or acquired property by singular titles, as contradistinguished from an ancestor, from whom the property has come by descent.

AU′THOR,† v. t. To occasion; to effect.

AU′THORESS, n. A female author.

AUTHO′RIAL, a. Pertaining to an author.

AUTHOR′ITATIVE, a. Having due authority.—2. Having an air of authority; positive; peremptory.

AUTHOR′ITATIVELY, adv. In an authoritative manner; with a show of authority; with due authority.

AUTHOR′ITATIVENESS, n. The quality of being authoritative; an acting by authority; authoritative appearance.

AUTHOR′ITY, n. [L. auctoritas.] 1. Legal power, or a right to command or to act; as, the authority of a prince over subjects, and of parents over children. Power; rule; sway.—2. The power derived from opinion, respect or esteem; influence of character or office; credit; as, the authority of age or example, which is submitted to or respected, in some measure, as a law, or rule of action. That which is claimed in justification or support of opinions and measures.—3. Testimony; witness; or the person who testifies; as, the Gospels or the evangelists are our authorities for the miracles of Christ.—4. Weight of testimony; credibility; as, an historian of no authority.—5. Weight of character; respectability; dignity; as, a magistrate of great authority in the city.—6. Warrant; order; permission.

By what authority doest thou these things? Mat. xxi.; Acts ix.

7. Precedents, decisions of a court, official declarations, respectable opinions and sayings, also the books that contain them, are called authorities, as they influence the opinions of others; and in law, the decisions of supreme courts have a binding force upon inferior courts, and are called authorities. —8. Government; the persons or the body exercising power or command.—In Connecticut, the justices of the peace are denominated the civil authority.

AUTHORIZA′TION, n. The act of giving authority or legal power; establishment by authority.

AUTHORIZE, v. t. [Fr. autoriser; Sp. autorizar] 1. To give authority, warrant, or legal power to; to give a right to act; to empower; as, to authorize commissioners to settle the boundary of the state.—2. To make legal; as, to authorize a marriage.—3. To establish by authority, as by usage or public opinion; as, an authorized idiom of language.—4. To give authority, credit, or reputation to; as, to authorize a report or opinion.—5. To justify; to support as right; as, suppress desires which reason does not authorize.

AU′THORIZED, pp. Warranted by right; supported by authority; derived from legal or proper authority; having power or authority.

AU'THORIZING, ppr. Giving authority to, or legal power, credit, or permission.

AU'THORSHIP, n. [author and ship.] The quality or state of being an author.

AUTOBIOGRAPH'ICAL, a. Containing autobiography.

AUTOBIOGRAPH'ICALLY, adv. By way of autobiography.

AUTOBIOG'RAPHY, n. [Gr. αυτος, and biography.] Biography, or memoirs of one's life written by himself.

AUTOCARP'IOUS, a. [Gr. αυτος, himself, and καρπος, fruit.] A name given to such fruit as consists of nothing but pericarp, without any additional organ, such as the calyx outwardly adhering.

AUTOCH'THON, n. [Gr. αυτοχθων.] One who rises or grows out of the earth, used by the ancient Greeks to designate native races supposed to be indigenous.

AUTOCHTHON'IC, a. Indigenous.

AUTOC'RASY, n. [Gr. αυτος, self, and κρατος, power, or κρατεω, to govern, to take, or hold.] 1. Independent power; supreme, uncontrolled, unlimited authority, or right of governing, in a single person.—2. Sole right of self-government in a state.

AU'TOCRAT, AU'TOCRATER, n. An absolute prince or sovereign; a ruler or monarch who holds and exercises the powers of government by inherent right, not subject to restriction; a title assumed by the emperors of Russia.—2. This title was sometimes conferred by the Athenians on their ambassadors and generals, when invested with unlimited powers.

AUTOCRAT'IC, AUTOCRAT'ICAL, a. Pertaining to autocracy; absolute; holding independent and unlimited powers of government.

AU'TOCRATRIX, n. A female sovereign, who is independent and absolute; a title given to the empresses of Russia.

Auto da fé. [Port. act of faith.] 1. In the Romish church, a solemn day held by the Inquisition, for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of the innocent accused. Span. Auto de fé.—2. A sentence given by the Inquisition, and read to a criminal, or heretic, on the scaffold, just before he is executed.—3. The session of the court of Inquisition.

AUTOG'ENOUS, a. [Gr. αυτο, and γινομαι, to generate.] Generating itself.

AU'TOGRAPH, AUTOG'RAPHY, n. [Gr. αυτος, self, and γραφη, writing.] A person's own hand-writing; an original manuscript or signature.

AUTOGRAPH'IC, AUTOGRAPH'ICAL, a. Pertaining to an autograph, or one's own hand-writing.

AUTOM'ALITE, n. A mineral called by Haüy, spinelle zincifère. It is classed with the spinel ruby. It occurs imbedded in talcky slate; the colour, a dark green. It is crystallized in regular octahedrons, or in tetrahedrons with truncated angles. It is harder than quartz, but not so hard as spinel. It is sometimes called gahnite, from Gahn, its discoverer.

AU'TOMATH, n. [Gr. αυτος, and μανθανω, to learn.] One who is self-taught.

AUTOMAT'IC, AUTOMAT'ICAL, a. Belonging to an automaton; having the power of moving itself; mechanical. This term has been employed to designate such economic arts as are carried on by self-acting machinery, such as cotton and flax mills, in which the elemental powers have been made to animate millions of complex organs, infusing into forms of wood, iron, and brass, an agency resembling that of intelligent beings. In physiol., those functions which are performed instinctively, and without the exercise of the will, are termed automatic.—2. Not voluntary; not depending on the will. Dr. Hartley has demonstrated, that all our motions are originally automatic, and generally produced by the action of tangible things on the muscular fibre.

AUTOM'ATON, n. [Gr. αυτοματος: αυτος, self, and μαω, moveo, motus. The Greek plural, automata, is sometimes used; but the regular English plural, automatons, is preferable.] A self-moving machine, or one which moves by invisible springs in such a manner, as to carry on for some time certain movements more or less resembling the results of animal exertion, without the aid of external impulse. In this respect, clocks, and watches, planetariums, common and smoke jacks, with a vast number of machines employed in cotton, silk, and other factories, may be denominated automatons. But the term automaton is, in common language, appropriated to that class of mechanical artifices, in which the purposely concealed power is made to imitate the arbitrary or voluntary motions of living beings, such as men, horses, birds, fishes, &c. Human figures of this kind, are sometimes called Androides. [See ANDROID.]

AUTOM'ATOUS, a. Having in itself the power of motion.

AUTONOM'ASY, n. [Gr. αυτο-, and ονομα, a name.] In rhet., a word of common or general signification, used for the name of a particular thing; as, the man has gone to the city, instead of London.

AUTONO'MEA, n. In zool., a genus of long-tailed decapod crustaceans, founded on autonomea olivii, which is little more than an inch in length. Autonomea lives solitarily in sea-weed, &c., and the female produces red eggs, which she carries with her about the middle of summer.

AUTONO'MIAN, a. Pertaining to autonomy.

AUTON'OMOUS, a. [Infra.] Independent in government; having the right of self-government.

AUTON'OMY, n. [Gr. αυτος, self, and νομος, law, rule.] This word is rarely used. It signifies the power or right of self-government, whether in a city which elects its own magistrates, and makes its own laws, or in an individual who lives according to his own will.

AU'TOPSY, n. [Gr. αυτοψια: αυτος, self, and οψις, sight.] Personal observation; ocular view.

AUTOPS'ICAL. See AUTOPTICAL.

AUTOP'TICAL, a. Seen with one's own eyes.

AUTOP'TICALLY, adv. By means of ocular view, or one's own observation. [Autopsy and its derivatives are rarely used.]

AU'TUMN, n. (au'tum.) [L. autumnus, "Etymon multum torquetur." Ainsworth.] The third season of the year, or the season between summer and winter. Astronomically, it begins at the equinox, when the sun enters Libra, and ends at the winter solstice; but in popular language, autumn comprises September, October, and November.

The golden pomp of autumn. Irving.

AUTUM'NAL, a. Belonging to autumn; produced or gathered in autumn; as, autumnal fruits. Autumnal equinox, the time when the sun enters the descending point of the ecliptic, where it crosses the equinoctial. This happens about the 22d of September. [See EQUINOX.] Autumnal signs, the signs Libra, Scorpio, and Sagittarius, through which the sun passes during the autumn.

AUTUM'NAL, n. A plant that flowers in autumn. The Autumnals form the third division of plants in Du Pas' arrangement.

AUXE'SIS, n. [Gr. αυξησις, increase.] In rhet., a figure by which any thing is magnified too much; an increasing, or exornation, when, for amplification, a more grave and magnificent word is put for the proper word.

AUXIL'IAR, AUXIL'IARY, a. [L. auxiliaris, from auxilium, aid, auxilior, to aid.] Helping; aiding; assisting; subsidiary; conferring aid or support by joint exertion, influence, or use; as, auxiliary troops. Auxiliary muscles, are those which concur with others, and aid them in their action.

AUXIL'IARIES, n. plur. Foreign troops in the service of nations at war.

AUXIL'IARY, n. A helper; an assistant; a confederate in some action, enterprise, or undertaking.—2. In gram., a verb which helps to form the moods and tenses of other verbs; as, have, be, may, can, do, must, shall, and will, in English; être and avoir in French; avére and essere, in Italian; estar and haber, in Spanish.

AVĀIL, v. t. [Fr. valoir, to be worth; L. valeo, to be strong or able, to profit, to be of force or authority; Sp. valer, to be valuable, to avail or prevail, to be binding, to be worth; It. valere, to be worth, to be useful; Eng. well; Ar. balla. The primary sense is, to stretch, or extend; whence strength, value.] 1. To profit one's self; to turn to advantage; followed by the pronouns, myself, thyself, himself, herself, ourselves, yourselves, themselves, with of before the thing used; as, let him avail himself of his license.—2. To assist or profit; to effect the object, or bring to a successful issue; as, what will skill avail us against numbers? Artifices will not avail the sinner in the day of judgment.

AVĀIL, v. i. To be of use, or advantage; to answer the purpose; as, strength without judgment will rarely avail. Generally, it signifies to have strength, force, or efficacy sufficient to accomplish the object; as, the plea in bar must avail, that is, be sufficient to defeat the suit; this scheme will not avail; medicines will not avail to check the disease; suppositions, without proof, will not avail.

AVĀIL, n. Profit; advantage toward success; benefit; as, labour without economy is of little avail. It seems usually to convey the idea of efficacious aid or strength. Avail of marriage, in Scots law, was a sum payable to the superior by the heir of a deceased ward vassal on his becoming marriageable.

AVĀILABIL'ITY, n. Availableness.

AVĀILABLE, a Profitable; advantageous; having efficacy; as, a measure is more or less available.—2. Having sufficient power, force, or efficacy, for the object; valid; as, an available plea.

Laws are available by consent. Hooker.

AVĀILABLENESS, n. Power or efficacy in promoting an end in view.—2. Competent power; legal force; validity; as, the availableness of a title.

AVAILABLY, adv. Powerfully; profitably; advantageously; validly; efficaciously.

AVAILING, ppr. Turning to profit; using to advantage or effect.

AVAILMENT, n. Profit; efficacy; successful issue. [Lit. us.]

AVAILS, n. plur. Profits or proceeds. It is used in New England, for the proceeds of goods sold, or for rents, issues, or profits.

AVALANCHE′, AVALANGE′, n. [Fr. from avaler, to fall.] A snow-slip; a vast body of snow sliding down a mountain. Avalanches are frequent in the Alps, and often cause great damage and loss of life by their fall. There are also earth-avalanches, or landslips, which cause great destruction.

AVANT′,† n. The front of an army. [See VAN.]

AVANT′-COUREUR, n. [Fr. See COURIER.] A runner; a person dispatched before another person, or company, to give notice of their approach.

AVANT′-FOSSE, n. In fort., the ditch of the counterscarp, next to the country. It is dug at the foot of the glacis.

AVANT′-GUARD, n. The van, or advanced body of an army. [See VANGUARD.]

AVANT′URINE, n. A variety of quartz rock containing spangles.

AV′ARICE, n. [L. avaritia, from avarus, from aveo, to covet.] An inordinate desire of gaining and possessing wealth; covetousness; greediness, or insatiable desire of gain.

Avarice sheds a blasting influence over the finest affections and sweetest comforts of mankind. Buckminster.

AVARI′CIOUS, a. Covetous; greedy of gain; immoderately desirous of accumulating property.

AVARI′CIOUSLY, adv. Covetously; with inordinate desire of gaining wealth.

AVARI′CIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being avaricious; insatiable or inordinate passion for property.

AV′AROUS,† a. Covetous.

AVAST, exclam. [Ger. basta, stop; bastant, sufficient; from It. basta, enough; Per. bas, enough.] An exclamation used by seamen. It always precedes some orders, or some conversation, and answers the same purpose, as, hark ye, list, attend, take heed, hold. It is also frequently used to signify hold your hand, hold fast.

AVATARA, AVATAR, n. A Sanscrit word, which properly signifies a descent, or the act of descending, e. g. from a boat, or other vehicle; but is particularly applied to the incarnations of the Hindoo deities, or their appearance in some manifest shape upon earth.

AVAUNT′, exclam. [W. ibant, begone.] Begone; depart; a word of contempt, or abhorrence, equivalent to the phrase, "Get thee behind me."

AVELLA′NE. In her., a cross, so called because the quarters of it resemble a filbert nut, (the fruit of corylus Avellana,) as in the annexed figure.

Avellane Cross.

A′VE MARY, n. [From the first words of Gabriel's salutation to the Virgin Mary; L. ave, hail.] A form of devotion in the Romish Church. Their chaplets and rosaries are divided into a certain number of ave-marys and paternosters.

AVE′NA, n. [Lat. supposed to come from aveo.] The oat, a genus of plants of the class Triandria, and order Digynia, and nat. order of Grasses. There are two species of oats, the black and the white, and of the latter there are many varieties. In Scotland, and some of the northern counties of England, oats form the principal food of the common people. They are much used in Germany; but in Norway, oat bread is a luxury among the common people.

AVENA′CEOUS, a. [L. avenaceus, from avena, oats; Fr. avoine.] Belonging to, or partaking of the nature of oats.

AV′ENAGE, n. [Fr.] A certain quantity of oats paid by a tenant to a landlord in lieu of rent, or other duty.

AV′ENER, AV′ENOR, n. [Norm. French.] In English feudal law, an officer of the king's stable whose duty was to provide oats.

AVENGE, v. t. (avenj′.) [Fr. venger; L. vindex. In Sax. winnan, to contend, to gain, to win.] 1. To take satisfaction for an injury by punishing the injuring party; to vindicate by inflicting pain or evil on the wrong doer.

Shall not God avenge his own elect? Luke xviii.

Avenge me of my adversary; Id. ver. 3.

In these examples, avenge implies that the evil inflicted on the injuring party is a satisfaction or justice done to the injured, and the party vindicated is the object of the verb.—2. To take satisfaction for, by pain or punishment inflicted on the injuring party.

He will avenge the blood of his servants; Deut. xxxii.

Here the thing for which satisfaction is taken is the object of the verb. 3. To revenge. To avenge and revenge, radically, are synonymous. But modern usage inclines to make a valuable distinction in the use of these words, restricting avenge to the taking of just punishment, and revenge to the infliction of pain or evil, maliciously, in an illegal manner.—4. In the passive form, this verb signifies to have or receive just satisfaction, by the punishment of the offender.

Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? Jer. v.

AVENGEANCE,† n. Punishment. [See VENGEANCE.]

AVENG′ED, pp. Satisfied by the punishment of the offender; vindicated; punished.

AVENGEMENT, n. Vengeance; punishment; the act of taking satisfaction for an injury by inflicting pain or evil on the offender; satisfaction taken; revenge.

AVENG′ER, n. One who avenges or vindicates; a vindicator; a revenger.

AVENG′ERESS, n. A female avenger.

AVENG′ING, ppr. Executing vengeance; taking satisfaction for an injury by the punishment of the offender; vindicating.

AV′ENS, n. The herb bennet. Geum urbanum.

AV′ENTINE, a. Pertaining to Mons Aventinus, one of the seven hills on which Rome stood.

AVEN′TURE, n. [Fr. aventure, from L. venio, to come.] A mischance causing a person's death without felony; as by drowning, or falling from a house. [See ADVENTURE.]

AV′ENUE, n. [Fr. from venir, to come or go; L. venio.] 1. A passage; a way or opening for entrance into a place; any opening or passage by which a thing is or may be introduced.—2. An alley, or walk in a garden, planted with trees, and leading to a house, gate, wood, &c., and generally terminated by some distant object. The trees may be in rows on the sides, or, according to the more modern practice, in clumps at some distance from each other.—3. A wide street, as in Washington, Columbia.

AVER′, v. t. [Fr. averer; It. avverare, to aver, or verify; Arm. quirya, from the root of verus, true; Ir. feor, or fir; W. gwir. See VERIFY.] To affirm with confidence; to declare in a positive or peremptory manner, as in confidence of asserting the truth.

AV′ERAGE, n. [Norm. aver, avers, cattle, money, goods; Sp. averio, from aver, or haber, Fr. avoir, to have, or possess. In ancient law, a duty or service which a tenant was bound to render to his lord, by his beasts and carriages, or instruments of husbandry. But averagium signifies also the loss of goods in transportation; Sp. averia, damage sustained by goods or ships; Port. avaria, an allowance out of freight to the master of a ship, for damage sustained: contribution by insurers, to make good a loss; It. avaria; Dan. haveric, damage of a ship, or waste of goods, extraordinary charges during a voyage. If avaria signifies damage, and is from aver, or haber, Spanish, to have, the sense of the word is probably that which happens or falls, a misfortune, for the verb have and happen are radically the same word; Spanish haber, to have, and to happen, or befall; also, fortune, property. This would give the sense of damage, or of proportion, lot, share, that which falls to each of a number. But the primary sense is not very obvious.] 1. In commerce, a contribution to a general loss. When for the safety of a ship in distress any destruction of property is incurred, either by cutting away the masts, throwing goods overboard, or other means, all persons who have goods on board, or property in the ship, contribute to the loss according to their average, that is, the goods of each on board. This principle, introduced into the commerce of Europe from the Rhodian laws, and recognized by the regulations of Wisby, is now an established rule in the maritime laws of Europe; for it is most reasonable, that when one man's property is sacrificed to save a ship, all persons whose property is saved, or in like hazard, should bear their proportion of the loss.—2. From the practice of contributing to bear losses, in proportion to each man's property, this word has obtained the present popular sense, which is, that of a mean proportion, medial sum or quantity, made out of unequal sums or quantities. Thus, if A loses 5 pounds, B 9, and C 16, the sum is 30, and the average 10.—3. A small duty payable by the shippers of goods, to the master of the ship, over and above the freight, for his care of the goods. Hence the expression in bills of lading, "paying so much freight, with primage and average accustomed." Average bond, a deed which it is usual for the parties liable to a general average to execute, empowering an arbiter to ascertain the value of the property lost, and to fix the proportion of the loss which each proprietor shall bear.—4. In England, the breaking up of cornfields, eddish, or roughings. Upon, or on an average, is taking the mean of unequal numbers or quantities.

AV'ERAGE, a. Medial; containing a mean proportion.

AV'ERAGE, v. t. To find the mean of unequal sums or quantities; to reduce to a medium; to divide among a number, according to a given proportion; as, to average a loss.

AV'ERAGE, v. i. To form a mean, or medial sum, or quantity; as, the losses of the owners will average 25 pounds each.

These spars average 10 feet in length
Belknap. Ch. Obs. x. 522, xi 302.

AV'ERAGED, pp. Reduced, or formed into a mean proportion, or into shares proportioned to each man's property.

AV'ERAGING, ppr. Forming a mean proportion out of unequal sums or quantities, or reducing to just shares according to each man's property.

AVER'MENT, n. [See AVER.] Affirmation; positive assertion; the act of averring.—2. Verification; establishment by evidence.—3. In pleading, an offer of either party to justify or prove what he alleges. In any stage of pleadings, when either party advances new matter, he avers it to be true, and concludes with these words, "and this he is ready to verify." This is called an averment.

AVER'NAT, n. A sort of grape.

AVER'NIAN, a. Pertaining to Avernus, a lake of Campania, in Italy, famous for its poisonous qualities, which the poets represent as so malignant, as to kill fowls flying over. Hence, as authors tell us, its name, ἄορνος, without birds.

AV'ER-PENNY, n. Money paid toward the king's carriages by land, instead of service by the beasts in kind.

AVER'RED, pp. Affirmed; laid with an averment.

AVERRHO'A, n. A genus of plants belonging to the wood-sorrel tribe. It consists of two species, both of which form small trees in the East Indies. One of these, called Belimbi, produces fruit of an extremely acid nature, the juice of which is found to be an excellent agent for removing iron-mould, or other spots from linen.

AVER'RING, ppr. Affirming: declaring positively; offering to justify, or verify.

AVER'ROIST, n. One of a sect of peripatetic philosophers, who were so denominated from Averroes, a celebrated Arabian author. They held the soul to be mortal, though they pretended to submit to the Christian theology.

AVERRUNC'ATE, v. t. [L. averrunco, of ad and erunco, from runco, to weed, or rake away.] To root up; to scrape or tear away by the roots.

AVERRUNCA'TION, n. The act of tearing up, or raking away by the roots.

AVERRUNCA'TOR, n. A pruning instrument consisting of two blades fixed on the ends of a rod, acting like scissors by means of a line fixed to one of them, and pulled by the operator.

Aversant, or Dorsed

AVERS'ANT, or DORSED. A term used in her.; a right hand is said to be dorsed, or aversant, when it is turned to show the back part.

AVERSA'TION, n. [L. aversor. See AVERT.] A turning from with disgust or dislike; aversion; hatred; disinclination. It is nearly superseded by aversion.

AVERSE, a. (avers'.) [See AVERT.] The literal sense of this word is, turned from, in manifestation of dislike. Hence the real sense is, 1. Disliking; unwilling; having a repugnance of mind.

Averse alike to flatter or offend. Pope

2. Unfavourable; indisposed; malign.

And Pallas now averse refused her aid.
Dryden.

This word and its derivatives ought to be followed by to, and never by from. This word includes the idea of from; but the literal meaning being lost, the affection of the mind signified by the word, is exerted toward the object of dislike, and like its kindred terms, hatred, dislike, contrary, repugnant, &c. should be followed by to. Indeed it is absurd to speak of an affection of the mind exerted from an object. Averse expresses a less degree of opposition in the mind, than detesting and abhorring. Milton once uses averse in its literal sense, with from, but it is not according to the English idiom.

AVERSELY, adv. (avers'ly.) With repugnance; unwillingly.

AVERSENESS, n. (avers'ness.) Opposition of mind; dislike; unwillingness; backwardness.

AVER'SION, n. [Fr. aversion, from L. averto.] 1. Opposition, or repugnance of mind; dislike; disinclination; reluctance; hatred. Usually this word expresses moderate hatred, or opposition of mind, not amounting to abhorrence or detestation. It ought generally to be followed by to before the object. [See AVERSE.] Sometimes it admits of for.

A freeholder is bred with an aversion to subjection Addison.

2. Opposition, or contrariety of nature; applied to inanimate substances.

Magnesia, notwithstanding this aversion to solution, forms a kind of paste with water.
Fourcroy, Trans.

3. The cause of dislike.

Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire.
Pope.

AVERT', v. t. [L. averto, a, from, and verto, to turn, anciently, vorto; hence vertex, vortex, averto; probably allied to L. vario; Eng. veer.] 1. To turn from; to turn off or away; as, to avert the eyes from an object.—2. To keep off, divert, or prevent; as, to avert an approaching calamity.—3. To cause to dislike. But this sense seems to be improper, except when heart, or some equivalent word, is used; as, to avert the heart or affections, which may signify to alienate the affections.

AVERT', v. i. To turn away.

AVERT'ED, pp. Turned from or away.

AVERT'ER, n. One who turns away; that which turns away.

AVERT'ING, ppr. Turning from; turning away.

A'VES, n. plur. [Lat.] Birds; Linnæus' second class of animals, distinguished by a double circulation and respiration, and by being oviparous.

A'VIARY, n. [L. aviarium, from avis, a fowl.] A bird-cage; a building erected for the breeding, rearing, and keeping of scarce and curious birds.

AVICEN'NIA, n. A genus of plants of the class Didynamia, and order Angiospermia, the flower of which consists of a single petal. One species is a large tree growing in Brazil. The fruit boiled in water is eaten, and the leaves are used in emollient cataplasms.

AVI'CULA, n. In zool., a genus of marine conchifers, or bivalves, with unequal valves, in which some naturalists include the genus Meleagrina, or pearl oyster, from which the most precious pearls are derived.

AVID'IOUSLY, adv. [See AVIDITY.] Eagerly; with greediness.

AVID'ITY, n. [L. aviditas, from avidus, and this from aveo, to desire, to have appetite; Heb. and Ch. אוה, aueh, to desire or covet.] 1. Greediness; strong appetite; applied to the senses.—2. Eagerness; intenseness of desire; applied to the mind.

AVIGA'TO, } n. The Persea, or alli-
AVOCA'DO, } gator-pear, a species belonging to the nat. order Laurineæ, and by some called Laurus Persea Gratissima, a native of the West Indies. The tree has a straight stem, long oval-pointed leaves, and flowers of six petals disposed like a star, produced in clusters, on the extremities of the branches. The fruit is insipid.

Avignon-berry, the fruit of Rhamnus Clusii, so called from the city Avignon, in France. The berry is less than a pea, of a yellowish green colour, and bitter astringent taste; used by dyers and painters for staining yellow.

AVILE,† v. t. [Fr. avilir. See VILE.] To depreciate.

A'VIS, n. Bird; plur. Aves, [Lat.] The second class of animals in the Linnæan system, a race of creatures sufficiently distinguished from others in having their body covered with feathers, two feet, and two wings formed for flight. They are divided into six orders by Linn., viz. accipitres, picæ, anseres, grallæ, gallinæ, and passeres. See these terms.

Avisandum, or Avizandum. In Scots law, literally signifies advising, or under consideration. To make avizandum with a process, is to remove it from the public court to the private consideration of the judge.

AVISE,† } n. [Fr. avis.] Advice; in-
AVI'SO,† } telligence.

AVISE,† v. i. (s as z.) To consider.

AVISEMENT, n. Advisement. [See ADVICE and ADVISE.]

AV'OCATE,† v. t. [L. avoco, from a and voco, to call. See VOICE and VOCAL.] To call off, or away.

AVOCA'TION, n. [See VOCATION, VOICE, VOCAL.] 1. The act of calling aside, or diverting from some employment; as, an avocation from sin, or from business.—2. The business which calls aside. The word is generally used for the smaller affairs of life, or occasional calls which summon a person to leave his ordinary or principal business. The use of this word for vocation is very improper.

AVO'CATIVE,† a. Calling off.

AVOID', v. t. [Fr. vuider, or vider; vuide, void, empty; Eng. wide, void, widow; L. vidua. See VOID. It coincides also with L. vito, evito; Fr. éviter.] 1. To shun; to keep at a distance from; that is, literally, to go or be wide from; as, to avoid the company of gamesters.—2. To shift off, or clear off; as, to avoid expense.—3. To quit; to evacuate; to shun by leaving; as, to avoid the house.—4. To escape; as, to avoid danger.—5. To emit or throw out; as, to avoid excretions. For this, void is now generally used.—6. To make void; to annul or vacate.

The grant cannot be avoided without injustice to the grantee. Anon.

7. In pleading, to set up some new matter or distinction, which shall avoid, that is, defeat or evade the allegation of the other party. Thus, in a replication, the plaintiff may deny the defendant's plea, or confess it, and avoid it by stating new matter.

AVOID', v. i. To retire; to withdraw.

David avoided out of his presence; 1 Sam. xviii. [Improper.]

2. To become void, vacant, or empty.

A benefice avoids by common law. Ayliffe.

AVOID'ABLE, a. That may be avoided, left at a distance, shunned, or escaped.—2. That may be vacated; liable to be annulled.

AVOID'ANCE, n. The act of avoiding or shunning.—2. The act of vacating, or the state of being vacant. It is appropriately used for the state of a benefice becoming void, by the death, deprivation, or resignation of the incumbent.—3. The act of annulling.—4. The course by which any thing is carried off.

AVOID'ED, pp. Shunned; evaded; made void; ejected.

AVOID'ER, n. One who avoids, shuns, or escapes.—2. The person who carries any thing away; the vessel in which things are carried away.

AVOID'ING, ppr. Shunning; escaping; keeping at a distance; ejecting; evacuating; making void, or vacant.

AVOID'LESS, a. That cannot be avoided; inevitable.

AVOIRDUPOIS', (s as z.) [Fr. avoir du pois, to have weight. See POISE.] A weight, of which a pound contains 16 ounces, in distinction to Troy weight, which has only twelve. 5760 grains make 1 pound Troy, and 7000 grains Troy make 1 pound Avoirdupois; hence, 175 pounds Troy are equal to 144 pounds Avoirdupois. This weight is used for all goods except the precious metals and medicines.

AVOLA'TION, n. [L. avolo, to fly away, of a and volo. See VOLATILE.] The act of flying away; flight; escape. [Lit. us.]

AV'OSET, } n. In ornith., a species AVOSET'TA, } of fowls, arranged under the genus Recurvirostra, and placed by Linnæus in the Grallic order, but by Pennant and Latham, among the Palmipeds. The bill is long, slender, flexible, and bent upward toward the tip. This bird is of the size of a lapwing, with very long legs, and the feathers variegated with black and white. It is found both in Europe and America.

Avoset (Recurvirostra avosetta).

AVOUCH', v. t. [Norm. voucher, to call, to vouch; L. voco, advoco. See VOICE.] 1. To affirm; to declare, or assert with positiveness.—2. To produce, or call in; to affirm in favour of, maintain, or support.

Such antiquities could be avouched for the Irish. Spenser.

3. To maintain, vindicate, or justify.

AVOUCH', n. Evidence; testimony; declaration. [Lit. us.]

AVOUCH'ABLE, a. That may be avouched. [Lit. us.]

AVOUCH'ED, pp. Affirmed; maintained; called in to support.

AVOUCH'ER, n. One who avouches.

AVOUCH'ING, ppr. Affirming; calling in to maintain; vindicating.

AVOUCH'MENT, n. Declaration; the act of avouching.

AVOW', v. t. [Fr. avouer; L. voveo.] 1. To declare openly, with a view to justify, maintain, or defend; or simply to own, acknowledge, or confess frankly; as, a man avows his principles, or his crimes.—2. In law, to acknowledge and justify; as, when the distrainer of goods defends in an action of replevin, and avows the taking, but insists that such taking was legal.

AVOW',† n. A vow or determination.

AVOW'ABLE, a. That may be avowed, or openly acknowledged with confidence.

AVOW'AL, n. An open declaration; frank acknowledgment.

AVOW'ANT, n. The defendant in replevin, who avows the distress of the goods, and justifies the taking.

Turned or twisted toward one side; not in a straight or true direction, or position; asquint; with oblique vision; as, to glance a look awry; the lady's cap is awry.—2. In a figurative sense, turned aside from the line of truth, or right reason; perverse or perversely.

AXAYA'CAT, n. A fly in Mexico, whose eggs, deposited on rushes and flags, in large quantities, are sold and used as a sort of caviare, called ahuauhtli. This was a dish among the Mexicans, as it now is among the Spaniards.

AXE, AX, n. [Sax. ex, eax, æse; G. axt; Sw. yxe; L. ascia; Gr. αξινη; It. azza; Eth. hatzi, an axe; or Ar. hazza, to cut; Ch. and Syr. חצינא hatzina, an axe.] An instrument usually of iron, for hewing timber and chopping wood. It consists of a head with an arching edge, and a helve or handle. The axe is of two kinds, the broad axe for hewing, and the narrow axe for rough-hewing and cutting. The hatchet is a small axe to be used with one hand.

AXE'-HEAD, n. The head or iron of an axe.

AX'IAL, a. Pertaining to an axis.

AXIF'EROUS, a. [L. axis, and fero, to bear.] A name given to those plants which, like lichens, fungi, &c., consist exclusively of an axis, without any leaves or appendages of it.

AX'IFORM, a. [L. axis and forma.] In the form of an axis.

AX'IL, n. [L. axilla; Ir. asgal; Fr. aisselle; D. oxel, the armpit; Ch. and Heb. אצל, atsel, to separate or set apart; whence אצילי, atsili, armpits.] 1. The armpit; a cavity under the upper part of the arm or shoulder.—2. In bot., the space or angle formed by a branch with the stem, or by a leaf with the stem or branch.

AX'ILE, a. [L. axis.] Lying in the axis of any thing, as an embryo which lies in the axis of a seed; that is, from the base to the end diametrically opposite.

AX'ILLAR, AX'ILLARY, a. Pertaining to the armpit, or to the axil of plants.—Axillary artery, a continuation of the subclavian.—Axillary gem, a gem or bud which proceeds from the axils of a plant.—Axillary vein, a continuation of the basilic vein, which receives the blood from the cephalic, and the veins corresponding to the branches of the axillary artery.—Axillary leaves are those which proceed from the angle formed by the stem and branch.

AX'INITE, n. A mineral which sometimes occurs in lamellar masses, but commonly in crystals, whose general form is that of a very oblique rhomb, or rather, four-sided prism, so flattened that some of its edges become thin and sharp, like that of an axe; whence its name, Gr. αξινη. This is the thumerstone of Kirwan. It has been sometimes called yanolite and violet shorl.

AXINOM'ANCY, n. [Gr. αξινη, an axe, and μαντεια, divination.] Among the ancients, a species of divination, by means of an axe or hatchet, performed by laying an agate-stone on a red-hot hatchet, or by fixing a hatchet on a round stake, so as to be poised; then the names of those suspected were reed, and he at whose name the hatchet moved, was pronounced guilty.

AXIOM, n. [Gr. ἀξιωμα, authority, an authoritative sentence, or that which is esteemed, from ἀξιος, worthy, ἀξιοω, to think worthy, to esteem; Eng. to ask [to axe;] that which is asked, sought or esteemed.] 1. A self-evident truth, or a proposition whose truth is so evident at first sight, that no process of reasoning or demonstration can make it plainer; as, "the whole is greater than a part."—2. An established principle in some art or science, a principle received without new proof; as, "things which are equal to the same thing, are equal to one another." It is an axiom in physical science, that nature does nothing in vain; that effects are proportional to their causes. It is an axiom in optics, that the angle of incidence is equal to the angle of reflection. In this sense, the general laws of motion are called axioms; as that all motion is naturally rectilinear; and that action and reaction are equal. That it is impossible for a thing both to be and not to be at the same time; and that from nothing, nothing can arise, are axioms in metaphysical science. All common notions of the mind, whose evidence is so clear and forcible that a man cannot deny them without renouncing common sense and natural reason, are also called axioms. The axioms of Euclid are very general propositions, and so also are the axioms of the Newtonian philosophy; but these two kinds of axioms have very different origins. The former appear true upon a bare contemplation of our ideas; whereas, the latter are the result of the most laborious induction. The former are also necessary or absolute truths, whose contraries the mind cannot conceive to be possible; but the latter are contingent truths depending on the will of the Supreme Being, and to suppose their contraries involves no contradiction or impossibility. They are true, because the Creator has willed them to be so, but they might have been otherwise than we find them to be. Axioms, or self-evident propositions, furnish the first principles of reasoning, and all true science must be based upon them, but we must take care in our reasonings not to confound the axioms of one science with those of another, as has often been done.

AXIOMAT'IC, } a. Pertaining to AXIOMAT'ICAL, } an axiom; having the nature of self-evident truths or received principles.

AXIOMAT'ICALLY, adv. By the use of axioms.

AX'IS, n. plur. axes. [L.; Gr. ἀξων, Russ. os, or osi; Sax ax; Fr. axe, or aissieu.] 1. The straight line, real or imaginary, passing through a body, on which it revolves, or may revolve; as the axis of the earth.—2. In geom., a straight line in a plane figure, about which it revolves to produce a solid.—Axis of a sphere, any line drawn through the centre and terminated both ways by the surface of the sphere.—Axis of a cone, a straight line drawn from the vertex to the centre of the base.—Axis of a cylinder, the line drawn from the centre of the one end to that of the other.—3. In conic sections, a right line dividing the section into two equal parts, and cutting all its ordinates at right angles.—Transverse axis, and Conjugate axis. [See TRANSVERSE and CONJUGATE.] Axis of the world, the imaginary axis passing through the celestial poles.—Axis of the earth, the line connecting its two poles, and about which the earth performs its diurnal rotation.—4. In mech., the axis of a balance is that line about which it moves, or rather turns.—The axis of oscillation is a right line parallel to the horizon passing through the centre, about which a pendulum vibrates.—5. The axis in peritrochio, the Latin name of the wheel and axle, is one of the six mechanic powers, consisting of a wheel fixed upon an axle, so as to turn along with the axle. [See WHEEL.]—6. In optics, a particular ray of light from any object which falls perpendicularly on the eye. 7. In archi., spiral axis is the axis of a twisted column spirally drawn in order to trace the circumvolutions without.—Axis of the Ionic capital is a line passing perpendicularly through the middle of the eye of the volute.—The axis of a vessel is an imaginary line passing through the middle of it, perpendicular to its base, and equally distant from its sides.—8. In bot., axis is a taper column in the centre of some flowers or catkins, about which the other parts are disposed. The stem or main body of a plant, with its root. It is formed by the development of an embryo or leaf bud.—9. In anat., axis is the name of the second vertebra of the neck: it has a tooth which enters into the first vertebra, and this tooth is by some called the axis.

Axis in Peritrochio.

AX'LE, } n. [Sax. ax, and tree.
AX'LE-TREE, } See AXIS.] A piece of timber or bar of iron, fitted for insertion in the hobs or naves of wheels, on which the wheels turn.

AX'OLOTL, n. A water lizard found in the Mexican lake, about eight inches in length, sometimes much larger. The skin is black and soft. It swims with its feet, which resemble those of a frog.

AXOT'OMOUS, a. [Gr. ἀξων, axis, and τεμνω, to cleave.] A mineralogical term signifying cleavable, in a direction perpendicular to the axis.

AXE STONE, n. A mineral, a subspecies of jade; less hard than nephrite; of a leek or grass green, olive green or greenish gray colour. It occurs amorphous, or in rolled fragments. It is found chiefly in New Zealand, and the South Sea isles, where it is used by the rude natives for axes and other instruments.

AY, } adv. [Ger D. Dan. Sw. ja, pron
AYE, } ya; Dan eya; Corn. ia, Ar. ya: Fr. oui. It may be a contracted word.] Yes, yea, a word expressing assent, or an affirmative answer to a question. It is used also to enforce the sense of what is asserted, equivalent to even so, truly, certainly.

AYE, adv. [Sax. aa, a, or awa: Gr. ἀει; Amh. ai, continually; D. eeuw, an age; Goth. aiw, an age, eternity; L. ævum, which, without its termination, is æv, æw; a contracted word; W. hauq. This is in Saxon ece, eternal, whence ecnesse, eternity, from ecan, to increase, extend; Eng. to eke.] Always; forever; continually; for an indefinite time; used in poetry.

AYLE, n. In law, a grandfather. [See BESAYLE.]

A'YRY, [See AERIE.]

AZA'LEA, n. A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Ericeæ, and consisting of shrubs remarkable for the beauty and fragrance of their flowers. By some botanists, the genus is esteemed the same as rhododendron.

AZ'AROLE, n. [Fr.] A species of thorn; the three-grained medlar, a species of Cratægus.

AZ'ERIT, }
AZERI'TA, } n. A species of plum or Prunus.
AZERI'RA, }

AZ'IMUTH, n. [Ar. samâtha, to move or go toward; (L. semita,) a way or path; with a prefix.] 1. In astr., an arch of the horizon intercepted between the meridian of the place, and the azimuth or vertical circle, passing through the centre of the object.—2. Magnetical azimuth, an arch of the horizon, intercepted between the azimuth or vertical circle, passing through the centre of any heavenly body, and the magnetic meridian. This is found by observing the object with an azimuth compass.—3. Azimuth compass, an instrument for finding either the magnetic azimuth or amplitude of a heavenly object. It differs from the common sea-compass only in this, that the circumference of Azimuth Compass.—a b sights.

the card, or box, is divided into degrees; also to the box is fitted an index with two sights, which are upright pieces of brass placed diametrically opposite to each other, having a slit down the middle of them, through which the sun or a star is to be viewed at the time of observation. [See COMPASS.]—4. Azimuth dial, a dial whose stile or gnomon is at right angles to the plane of the horizon.—5. Azimuths or vertical circles, are great circles intersecting each other in the zenith and nadir, and cutting the horizon at right angles. On charts, these azimuths are represented by rhumbs, and on the globe, by the quadrant of altitude, when screwed in the zenith.

AZ'IMUTHAL, a. Pertaining to the azimuth.

AZOBEN'ZIDE, n. A crystalline substance obtained by distilling a solution which is formed when nitrobenzide is dissolved in alcohol, and heated with solid hydrate of potash.

AZOBEN'ZOIDE, n. A white powder derived from oil of bitter almonds prepared by distillation, and put in contact with ammonia.

AZOBEN'ZULE, n. A fine white crystalline powder contained along with nitrobenzule, in the residue of the preparation of benzhydramide.

AZOM'ARIC ACID, n. An acid obtained from the turpentine of Pinus maritima.

AZŌTE, n. [Gr. α priv. and ζωη, life, or ζωτικος, vital.] A species of gas, called also mephitic air, and atmospheric mephitis, on account of its fatal effects upon animal life. It is tasteless, and inodorous; it exists in common air, mixed with oxygen, and constitutes about seventy-nine hundredth parts by volume of atmospheric air. It may be obtained, in large quantities, from the muscular fibres of animals. Combined with hydrogen, it forms volatile alkali; and it enters into the composition of most animal substances. It is the radical of nitric acid, and is now called nitrogen gas, or nitrogen.

AZ'OTH,† n. Among alchemists, the first principle of metals; the mercury of metals; a universal medicine.—2. The liquor of sublimated quicksilver; brass.

AZOT'IC, a. Pertaining to azote, fatal to animal life.

AZ'OTITE, n. A salt formed by a combination of nitrous acid with a base; synonymous with nitrite.

A'ZOTIZE, v. t. To imbue with nitrogen; to deprive of life.

A'ZOTIZED, pp. Imbued with nitrogen, or azote; containing azote. All such parts of vegetables as can afford nutriment to animals contain azote.

AZ'URE, a. (azh'ur.) [Persic, lazurd, blue; Fr. azur; W. asur, blue. Hence lazuli, in Lapis Lazuli.] Of a sky-blue; resembling the clear blue colour of the sky.

AZ'URE, n. (azh'ur.) The fine blue colour of the sky. This word was formerly applied to the lapis lazuli, and the colour prepared from it. But it is now applied to the blue extracted from cobalt, though somewhat a different colour; the blue of the lapis is called ultramarine. Azure is applied also to the blue glass made of the oxide of cobalt and vitrifiable substances reduced to fine powder. In large masses it is called smalt.—2. The sky, or azure vault of heaven.—3. In her., a blue colour in coats of all persons under the degree of baron, represented in engraving by horizontal lines.

Azure.

AZ'URE, v. t. To colour blue.

AZ'URED, a. (azh'ured.) Coloured azure; being of an azure colour.

AZ'URE-STONE, } n. Another name
AZ'URITE, } of the lazulite.

AZ'URE-TINTED, a. Having a tint of azure colour.

AZ'URN, a. Of a blue colour. [Little us.]

A'ZYGOS, a. [Gr. α priv. and ζυγος.] In anat., an epithet applied to several muscles, veins, bones, &c., that are single.

AZ'YME,† n. [See AZYMOUS.] Unleavened bread.

AZ'YMITE, n. [See AZYMOUS.] In Church hist., Azymites are Christians who administer the Eucharist with unleavened bread.

AZ'YMOUS, a. [Gr. α priv. and ζυμη, leaven.] Unleavened; unfermented; as sea-biscuit.

B

B IS the second letter, and the first articulation, or consonant, in the English, as in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and most other alphabets. In the Ethiopic, it is the ninth letter, and its shape is that of a hut. Perhaps from this or other like figure, it received its Hebrew name, beth, a house. It is a mute, and a labial, being formed by pressing the whole length of the lips together, as in pronouncing eb. It is less perfectly mute than p, as may be perceived by pronouncing the syllables ab and ap. It is convertible, 1st, with p, as in the Celtic, ben or pen, a mountain; in the English, beak and peak, beck and peck; 2d, with v, as in the German, silber for silver; and in Spanish, b and v are used indifferently, 3d, with f, as in bore and perforo; Eng. bear, L. fero; in the Celtic bun, bunadh, bunait, stock, origin, foundation; English, found; L. fundamentum; with the Greek, as Bilip, for Φιλιππος; 4th, with v and w; as, Ir. fior, L. verus; fear, vir, Ir. buiac, the wick of a candle. The Greek B is always pronounced like the English V, and the Russian B corresponds with the Greek. In composition, the letter B is changed into p before the letter p; as in opprimo, from ob and premo; oppono, from ob and pono; into f, before f, as in affero, from ob and fero; into c before c, as in occido, from ob and cado, and cædo. As a numeral B was used by the Hebrews and Greeks, as now by the Arabians, for 2; by the Romans for 300, and with a dash over it thus, B̄ for 3000. B is used also as an abbreviation; thus B. A. stand for bachelor of arts; B. L. for bachelor of laws; B. D. for bachelor of divinity; B. F. before the decrees of the old Romans, for bonum factum. In music, B stands for the tone above A; B♭, for B flat, or the semitone major above A. B also stands for bass, and B. C. for basso continuo, or thorough bass.

BÄÄ, n. The cry, or appropriate bleating of sheep.

BÄÄ, v. i. To cry, or bleat as sheep.

BA'AL, n. [Oriental, בעל, bol, lord.] An idol among the ancient Chaldeans and Syrians, representing the sun. The word signifies also lord, or commander; and the character of the idol was varied by different nations, at different times. Thus Baal Berith is supposed to signify, the Lord of the Covenant; Baal Peor, or rather Baal Phegor, the Lord of the dead; Ps. cvi. Baal Zebub, the god of flies, &c.

BAB'BLE, v. i. [D. babbelen; Fr. babiller; properly to throw out.] To utter words imperfectly, or indistinctly, as children.—2. To talk idly, or irrationally; to talk thoughtlessly.—3. To talk much, to prate; hence, to tell secrets.—4. To utter sounds frequently, incessantly, or indistinctly; as, a babbling echo; a babbling stream.

BAB'BLE, v. t. To prate; to utter.

BAL′ANCE, n. [Fr balance; L bilanx, bis, twice, and lanx, a dish, the double dish.] 1. A pair of scales for weighing commodities. It consists of a beam or lever suspended exactly in the middle, with a scale or basin hung to each extremity, of precisely equal weight. The annexed figure represents the common balance. A B is the beam which rests in a horizontal position, and is capable of turning on the centre of motion C. D and E are the scales which are suspended from the points A and B, the extremities of the beam, called the centres of suspension. Midway between the centres of suspension, and directly above the centre of motion, there rises from the upper surface of the beam a perpendicular slender stem called the tongue, which, when the beam is horizontal, points to the top of the handle F, by which the whole is suspended. In a properly constructed balance, the beam should rest in a horizontal position, when the scales are either empty or loaded with equal weights; a very small addition of weight put into either scale should cause the beam to deviate from the horizontal position, which property is termed the sensibility of the balance; the arms of the beam should be inflexible, exactly similar, equal in weight and length, and as long as possible. The centres of suspension of the scales, and the centre of gravity of the beam should be all in one straight line, and the centre of motion should be a little above the centre of gravity. The centre of motion, and the centre of suspension, should cause as little friction as possible. False balance, a balance constructed for fraudulent purposes, having the arms of unequal lengths, but of equal weights. When the scales are empty, the beam rests in a horizontal position, and the balance appears to be just, but when a weight is put into the scale suspended from the short arm, a less weight of goods put into the other scale will be sufficient to cause the beam to settle in a horizontal position, and produce an apparent equilibrium. The readiest way of detecting such a balance, is to make the weight and the article weighed to change places, for then the scale suspended from the longer arm will immediately preponderate The Roman balance, our steelyard, consists of a lever, or beam, moveable on a centre, and suspended near one of its extremities [See STEELYARD.] Hence,—2. One of the simple powers in mechanics, used for determining the equality or difference of weight in heavy bodies, and consequently their masses or quantity of matter —3. Figuratively, an impartial state of the mind, in deliberating; or a just estimate of the reasons and arguments on both sides of a question, which gives to each its due weight, or force and importance.—4. As balance signifies equal weight, or equality, it is by custom used for the weight or sum necessary to make two unequal weights, or sums equal; that which is necessary to bring them to a balance or equipoise. Hence, in accounts, balance is the difference of two sums; as upon an adjustment of accounts, a balance was found against A in favour of B. Hence, to pay a balance, is to pay the difference, and make the two accounts equal.—5. Balance of trade, is an equal exportation of domestic productions, and importation of foreign. But, usually, the term is applied to the difference between the amount or value of the commodities exported and imported. Hence the common expression, The balance of trade is against, or in favour of a country.—6. Equipoise, or an equal state of power between nations; as, the balance of power.—7. The hydrostatic balance, is an instrument to determine the specific gravity of fluid and solid bodies. The assay balance, is one which is used in docimastic operations, to determine the weight of minute bodies. There are various other balances, as the bent-lever balance, Danish balance, spring balance, compound balance, electrical balance, &c.

Common Balance.

BAL′ANCE, v. t. To adjust the weights in the scales of a balance, so as to bring them to an equipoise. Hence,—2. To weigh reasons; to compare, by estimating the relative force, importance, or value of different things; as, to balance good and evil.—3. To regulate different powers, so as to keep them in a state of just proportion; as, to balance Europe, or the powers of Europe.—4. To counterpoise; to make of equal weight or force; to make equipollent; as, one species of attraction balances another.

One expression in the letter must check and balance another. Kent.

5. To settle and adjust, as an account; to find the difference of two accounts, and to pay the balance, or difference, and make them equal.—6. In seamanship, to contract a sail, by rolling up a small part of it at one corner. In engineering, to adjust the line of a road, railway, or other work, so that the earth, or other material removed from the eminences, shall fill up the hollows.

BAL′ANCE, v. i. To have on each side equal weight; to be on a poise.—2. To hesitate; to fluctuate between motives which appear of equal force, as a balance plays when poised by equal weights.

Between right and wrong, never balance a moment. Anon.

BAL′ANCED, pp. Charged with equal weights; standing on an equipoise; regulated so as to be equal; settled; adjusted; made equal in weight or amount BANK, n. [Sax. banc; It. banco; Fr. banc, banque; W. banc; Arm. bancq; Ar. bank, a bench. Bank and bench are radically the same word. The sense is, that which is set, laid or extended. Applied to a mass of earth, it is a collection, that which is thrown or laid together.] 1. A mound, pile, or ridge of earth, raised above the surrounding plain, either as a defence or for other purposes; 2 Sam. xx. 15.—2. Any steep acclivity, whether rising from a river, a lake, or the sea, or forming the side of a ravine, or the steep side of a hillock on a plain. When we speak of the earth in general adjoining a lake or the sea, we use the word shore; but a particular steep acclivity on the side of a lake, river, or the sea, is called a bank.—3. A bench or a bench of rowers, in a galley; so called from their seat.

Placed on their banks, the lusty Trojans sweep. Waller.

4. By analogy, a collection, or stock of money deposited, by a number of persons, for a particular use; that is, an aggregate of particulars, or a fund; as, to establish a bank, that is, a joint fund. 5. The place where a collection of money is deposited; a common repository of the money of individuals, or of companies; also, a house used for a bank. Banks are establishments intended to serve for the safe custody of money, to facilitate its payment by one individual to another, and sometimes for the accommodation of the public with loans. Banks are commonly divided into two great classes; banks of deposit, and banks of circulation. This division, however, is not a very distinct one; for there is no bank of deposit that is not at the same time a bank of circulation, and few or no banks of circulation that are not also banks of deposit. But the term banks of deposit, is meant to designate those which keep the money of individuals, and circulate it only; while the term banks of circulation is applied to those which do not thus confine their circulation, but issue notes of their own payable on demand. The Bank of England is the principal bank of circulation in the empire; but it, as well as the private banks in England and Scotland that issue notes, is also a bank of deposit. The establishment of banks, has contributed in no ordinary degree to give security and facility to all sorts of commercial transactions. They afford safe and convenient places of deposit for the money that would otherwise have to be kept at a considerable risk in private houses. They also prevent in a great measure the necessity of carrying money from place to place to make payments, and enable them to be made in the most convenient and least expensive manner.—6. A company of persons concerned in a bank, whether a private association, or an incorporated company; the stockholders of a bank, or their representatives, the directors, acting in their corporate capacity.—7. An elevation, or rising ground in the sea; called also flats, shoals, shelves, or shallows. These may rise to the surface of the water, or near to it; but the word bank signifies also elevated ground at the bottom of the sea, when many fathoms below the surface; as, the banks of Newfoundland.

BANK, v. t. To raise a mound, or dyke; to inclose, defend, or fortify with a bank; as, to bank a house.—2.† To pass by the banks of.

BÄRKER'S MILL, n. An ingenious machine, moved by the centrifugal force of water, invented more than a century ago, by Dr. Barker, and forming one of the simplest water-mills ever constructed. It consists of a vertical axis C. D., moving on a pivot at D, and carrying the upper millstone m, after passing through an opening in the fixed millstone C. Upon this vertical axis is fixed a vertical tube T T, communicating with a horizontal tube A B, at the extremities of which, A and B, are two apertures in opposite directions. When water from the mill-course M N, is introduced into the tube T T, it flows out of the apertures A and B, and by the counterpressure of the issuing water, the arm A B, and consequently, the whole machine, is put in motion. The bridge tree a b is elevated or depressed, by turning the nut c, at the end of the lever c b. The effect of the machine depends on the height of the vertical tube, and the length of the arm A B. It has been rarely introduced in practice, though recommended by most writers on hydraulics.

Barker's Mill.

BÄRK-GALLED, a. Having the bark galled, as with thorns. This defect is cured by binding on clay.

BAROMETER, n [Gr βαρος, weight, and μετρον, measure] An instrument for measuring the weight or pressure of the atmosphere, consisting of a glass tube, hermetically sealed at one end, filled with quicksilver, well defecated and purged of air, and inverted in a basin of quicksilver A column of

Marine Barometer Common Upright Barometer

quicksilver is then supported in the tube, of equal weight with the incumbent atmosphere This instrument was invented by Torricelli, of Florence, in 1643 Its uses are to indicate the changes of weather, and to determine the altitude of mountains, by the falling and rising of the mercury For this purpose the tube is fixed to a graduated scale, so that the smallest variation in the column is visible There are various kinds of barometers, such as the common barometer, the diagonal barometer, the horizontal, or rectangular barometer, the wheel barometer, the steelyard barometer, the pendant barometer, compound barometer, the marine barometer, of which there are several kinds, the portable barometer, &c The two kinds most in use, are the common upright barometer, and the wheel barometer.

Wheel Barometer

The common barometer, which consists of an upright tube filled with mercury, with a basin at the lower end, and a scale attached to the top, to mark the rise and fall of the mercury, is, when properly constructed, the most accurate of all barometers The wheel barometer is far from being accurate, but it is often preferred for ordinary use, on account of the greater range of its scale, by which small differences in the height of the column of mercury are more easily observed The portable barometer, which is used for measuring the height of mountains, is just a common barometer, having a movable basin with a screw, by which the mercury may be forced up to the top of the tube, when the instrument has to be carried from place to place

BAROMETRICAL, a Pertaining or relating to the barometer, made by a barometer, as, barometrical experiments barometrical measurements

BAROMETRICALLY, adv By means of a barometer

It is brought from the East Indies and from Arabia, in pieces of different sizes and figures, externally of a dark reddish brown, internally clear, and not unlike to glue. To the taste it is slightly bitterish and pungent; its odour is agreeable. In the mouth, it becomes soft and sticks to the teeth; on a red hot iron, it readily catches flame and burns with a crackling noise. It is used as a perfume and a medicine, being a weak deobstruent.

BE, v. i. substantive verb; ppr being; pp. been. [Sax. beon, to be; G. bin, bist; Pers. bodan, to be; and W. bôd, byzu, bydiaw. The sense is, to stand, remain, or be fixed; hence, to continue. This verb is defective, and its defects are supplied by verbs from other roots, am, is, was, were, which have no radical connection with be. The case is the same with the substantive verb in most languages.] 1. To be fixed; to exist; to have a real state or existence, for a longer or shorter time.

> Let this mind be in you, which was in Christ Jesus; Phil. ii.

> To be, contents his natural desire. Pope.

To have a particular manner of being or happening; as, how is this affair? how was it? what were the circumstances? This verb is used as an auxiliary in forming the tenses of other verbs, and particularly in giving to them the passive form; as, he has been disturbed. It forms, with the infinitive, a particular future tense, which often expresses duty, necessity, or purpose; as, government is to be supported; we are to pay our just debts. Let be, is to omit, or leave untouched; to let alone.

> Let be, said he, my prey. Dryden.

BE, a prefix, as in because, before, beset, bedeck, is the same word as by; Sax. be, big; Goth bi. It is common to the English, Saxon, Gothic, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish languages. It occurs probably in the Russian, but is written po, as it is in posideo, and a few other words in the Latin. It denotes nearness, closeness, about, on, at, from some root signifying to pass, or to press. [See BY.] That this word is the Shemitic ב, used as a prefix, is certain, not only from its general applications, which may be seen by comparing the uses of the word, in the Hebrew for instance, with those in the Saxon; but from its use in particular phrases, particularly in its use before the name of the Supreme Being in swearing. Hence we find that ב is not from בה, beh, nor from בית, bith, as Parkhurst supposes, but is an abbreviation of big, which is used in the Saxon bigspell, a proverb, a by-word; bigstandan, to stand by.

The Sax. be is the Eng. by. These significations differ from the sense in English. But the sense is to come to, to arrive, to reach, to fall or pass to. [See COME.] Hence the sense of suiting, agreeing with. In Sax. cuman, G. kommen ... to come; and Sax. cweman is to please, that is, to suit or be agreeable.] 1. To pass from one state to another; to enter into some state or condition, by a change from another state or condition, or by assuming or receiving new properties or qualities, additional matter, or a new character; as, a scion becomes a tree.

The Lord God ... breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. Gen. ii.

To the Jews I became as a Jew. 1 Cor. ix.

2. To become of, usually with what preceding; to be the fate of; to be the end of; to be the final or subsequent condition; as, what will become of us. In the present tense, it applies to place as well as condition. What has become of my friend? that is, where is he? as well as, what is his condition? Where is he become? is used by Shakspeare and Spenser, ... but this is not the sense in ... when ... fall in.

BECOME, v. t. In general, to suit or be suitable; to be congruous; to befit; to accord with, in character or circumstances; to be worthy of, decent or proper. It is used in the same sense applied to persons or things.

If I become not a cart as well as another man ... Shak.

The use of the word, however, is less frequent; the verb usually expressing the suitableness of things, to persons or to other things; as, a robe becomes a prince.

It becomes me so to speak of an excellent poet. Dryden.

BECOMING, ppr. but used chiefly, except as an adjective. Fit; suitable; congruous; proper; graceful; belonging to the character, or adapted to circumstances; as, he speaks with becoming boldness; a dress is very becoming. Some writers formerly used of after this word.

Queen Bee

the most interesting to man. It has been cultivated from the earliest periods, for its wax and honey. It lives in swarms or societies, of from 10,000 to 50,000 individuals. These swarms contain three classes of bees, the females or queen bees, the males or drones, and the neuters or working bees. Of the former, there is only one in each hive or swarm, whose sole office is to propagate the species. It is much larger than the other bees. The drones serve merely for impregnating the queen,

Wo[illegible] Be[illegible]

after which, they are destroyed by the neuters. These last are the labourers of the hive. They collect the honey, form the cells, and feed the other bees and the young. They are furnished with a proboscis by which they suck the honey from flowers, and a mouth by which they swallow it, and then convey it to the hive in their stomachs, where they disgorge it into the cells. The pollen of flowers settles on the hairs with which their body is covered, whence it is collected into pellets by a brush on their second pair of legs, and deposited in a hollow in the third pair. It is called bee bread, and is the food of the larvae or young. The adult bees feed on honey. The wax was supposed to be formed from pollen by a digestive process, but it is now ascertained that it is formed from the honey by a similar process. The females and neuters have a barbed sting, attached to a bag of poison, which flows into the wound inflicted by the sting. When a hive is overstocked, a new colony is sent out under the direction of a queen bee. This is called swarming.—In America, a joint voluntary and gratuitous aid afforded by neighbours to their minister, or to any person in need.

BEEBIRA, n. The bark of a tree found in British Guiana, having tonic properties like Peruvian bark, and yielding an alkaline matter called Beeberine.

BEE-BREAD, n. [bee and bread.] The pollen of flowers collected by bees, as food for their young. [See BEE.]

BEE-EATER, n. [bee and eat.] A bird that feeds on bees. There are several species included in the genus Merops, of which the Apiaster of Europe is remarkable for the brilliancy of its plumage.

BEE-FLOWER, n. [bee and flower.] A plant, Ophrys Apifera, a species of Ophrys or Twayblade, whose flowers represent singular figures of bees, flies and other insects.

BEE-GARDEN, n. [bee and garden.] A garden, or inclosure to set bee hives in.

BEE-GLUE, n. [bee and glue.] A soft unctuous matter with which bees cement the combs to the hives, and close up the cells; called also propolis.

BEE-HIVE, n. [bee and hive.] A case, box, or other hollow vessel which serves as a habitation for bees. Hives are made of various materials, as of boards, the hollow trunk of a tree, and with of straw or of glass.

BEE-MASTER, n. [bee and master.] One who keeps bees.

BEECH, n. [Sax. bece, boc; G. buche, or buchbaum; Russ. buk; Gr. [illegible]; L. fagus. In Saxon boc and bec is a book. It may be that beech is properly the name of bark, and this being used by our rude ancestors, as the material for writing, the word came to signify a book.] A tree arranged by Linnaeus under the genus Fagus, with the chestnut. The common beech is the Fagus Sylvatica, Linn., in class and order Monoecia Polyandria, nat. or. Amentaceae. The beech grows to a large size, with branches forming a beautiful head, with thick foliage. The bark is smooth and of a silvery cast. The mast or nuts are the food of swine, and of certain wild animals, and yield a good oil for lamps. When eaten by man, they are said to occasion giddiness and headach. Beech is not much used in building, as it soon rots in damp places; but it is used as piles in places where it is constantly wet. It is manufactured into a great variety of tools, for which its great hardness and uniform texture render it superior to all other sorts of wood. It is also extensively used in making furniture.

BEECH-COAL, n. [beech and coal.] Charcoal from beech wood.

BEECHEN, a. (bee'chn.) Consisting of the wood or bark of the beech; belonging to the beech; as a beechen vessel.

BEECHMAST, n. The fruit or nuts of the beech.

BEECH-OIL, n. [beech and oil.] Oil expressed from the mast or nuts of the beech tree. It is used in Picardy and in other parts of France, instead of butter; but it is said to occasion heaviness and pains in the stomach.

BEECH-TREE, n. [beech and tree.] The beech.

BEEF, n. [Fr. bœuf, beuf, an ox; Sp. buey; Port. boy; W. bu; Corn. byuh, an ox; Ir. bo, a cow; plu. buaibh; L. bos, bovis; Gr. [illegible].] 1. An animal of the bovine genus, whether ox, bull or cow; but used of those which are full grown or nearly so. In this, which is the original sense, the word has a plural, beeves. 2. The flesh of an ox, bull or cow when killed. In pop. lan., the word is often applied to the live animal; as, an ox is good beef; that is, well fattened. In this sense, the word has no plural.

BEEF, a. Consisting of the flesh of the ox or bovine kind; as, a beef steak.

BEEF-EATER, n. [beef and eat.] One that eats beef. 2. A popular appellation for the yeomen of the king's guard, and the term thus applied is supposed to be a corruption from the French beaufetier, an officer appointed to watch the beaufet, buffet or side-board, because some of the yeomen originally were ranged at table on solemn festivals. 3. The Buphaga, an African bird that feeds on the larvas which nestle under the hides of oxen.—4. In pop. use, a stout fleshy man.

BEEF-STEAK, n. [beef and steak.] A steak or slice of beef for broiling.
